Calvin^{1} /'kælvɪn/, John (1509–64), French Protestant theologian and reformer. He began his theological career in France, but was forced to flee to Basle in Switzerland after embracing Protestantism in the early 1530s. At Basle he published (1536) the first edition of his Institutes of the Christian Religion, the first systematic account of reformed Christian doctrine and a work which he continued to revise and extend throughout his lifetime. He attempted a re-ordering of society on reformed Christian principles, with strong and sometimes ruthless control over the private lives of citizens. From 1541 he lived in Geneva, where he established the first Presbyterian government. Through his Institutes and an extensive body of commentary on the Scriptures, he exerted an important influence on the development of Protestant thought; his theology was further developed by his followers, notably Theodore Beza (1519–1605). (See also CALVINISM.)

Calvin^{2} /'kælvɪn/, Melvin (1911–97), American biochemist. He investigated the metabolic pathways involved in photosynthesis, discovering the cycle of reactions which is named after him, and attempting to duplicate them synthetically. He was awarded the Nobel Prize for chemistry in 1961.

Calvin cycle n. Biochem. a cycle of reactions, forming an important part of photosynthesis, whereby plants synthesize glucose from atmospheric carbon dioxide. [CALVIN^{2}]

Calvinism /'kælvɪˌnɪz(ə)m/ n. the Protestant theological system of John Calvin and his successors. In Calvinism, Martin Luther's doctrine of justification by faith alone becomes an overriding emphasis on the grace of God, which culminates in the central place given to the doctrine of predestination: certain souls (known as the elect) are predestined by God to salvation, and the rest to damnation. Calvinism was adopted particularly in Scotland, Switzerland, and the Netherlands, by the Puritans, and by American Congregationalists and Presbyterians; in the 20th century Calvinist ideas underwent something of a revival in the work of Karl Barth. □ Calvinist n. & adj. Calvinistic /ˌkælvɪ'nɪstɪk/ adj. Calvinistical adj. [F calvinisme or mod.L calvinismus]

Calvino /kæl'viːnəʊ/, Italo (1923–87), Italian novelist and short-story writer, born in Cuba. His first novel The Path to the Nest of Spiders (1947) is considered a significant example of neo-realism, whereas his later works increasingly use fantasy, allegory, and innovative narrative structures and have been associated with magic realism; his later novels include Invisible Cities (1972) and If on a Winter's Night a Traveller (1979).

Cambodia /kæmˈbəʊdɪə/ a country in SE Asia between Thailand and southern Vietnam; pop. (est. 1991) 8,660,000; official language, Khmer; capital, Phnom Penh. Formerly part of the Khmer empire, the country was made a French protectorate in 1863 and remained under French influence until it became fully independent in 1953. It was bombed and then invaded by US forces during the Vietnam War, and then embroiled in a civil war in 1970–5, which was won by the Khmer Rouge; more than 2 million Cambodians died before the regime was toppled by a Vietnamese invasion in 1979. The country has continued to be plagued by intermittent fighting, although the Vietnamese withdrew in 1989; the monarchy was restored in 1993. The country was known officially as the Khmer Republic from 1970 to 1975 and as Kampuchea from 1976 to 1989.

camera /ˈkæmrə, ˈkæmərə/ n. 1 an apparatus for recording visual images on light-sensitive film or plates, consisting essentially of a lightproof box into which light, focused by a lens, can be briefly admitted by a shutter mechanism. (See note below.) (See also PHOTOGRAPHY.) 2 an apparatus for forming an optical image and converting it into a video signal for transmission or storage. □ camera-ready Printing (of copy) in a form suitable for immediate photographic reproduction. in camera 1 Law in a judge's private room. 2 privately; not in public. on camera (esp. of an actor) being filmed or televised at a particular moment. [orig. = chamber f. L camera f. Gk kamara vault etc.]

▪ Cameras were developed during the 19th century and originally used metal and then glass plates with a sensitized coating. Later, flexible roll-film of coated celluloid was used, enabling cameras to be made much smaller and more portable, and the tendency towards miniaturization has continued. Reflex cameras originally used two lenses, one to give an image for viewing on a ground-glass screen, the other to focus the image on the film; single-lens reflex cameras achieve a similar result by a complex arrangement of reflecting mirrors. Developments in photoelectric devices have enabled highly automated systems of focusing and exposure to be introduced. In cine cameras, the film is moved rapidly past a rotating shutter, though such cameras have largely been superseded for domestic use by the video camcorder. (See also TELEVISION.)

camera lucida /ˈluːsɪdə/ n. (pl. camera lucidas) an instrument, esp. attached to a microscope, by which an image of an object is reflected by a prism on to a flat surface on which it can be traced. [L, = bright chamber] camera obscura /əbˈskjʊərə/ n. (pl. camera obscuras) a darkened box or room with a lens and an aperture for projecting an image of a distant object on to a screen within. Aristotle was aware of the principle on which this depends, and early astronomers such as Johannes Kepler used a form of it to watch and record phenomena such as eclipses. Its use by artists became a craze in the 18th century, and camera obscuras were used by Canaletto and others in topographical painting. [L, = dark chamber] camerawork /'kæmrəˌwɜːk, 'kæmərə-/ n. the technique of using cameras in films or television.

Cameron /'kæmərən/, Julia Margaret (1815–79), English photographer. Although she did not take up photography until the age of 48, she quickly gained acclaim for her portraits of prominent figures such as Tennyson, Darwin, and Carlyle. She is credited with being the first to use soft-focus techniques; her work often reflects the influence of contemporary painting, especially that of the Pre-Raphaelites.

Camões /kæ'mɔɪnʃ/, Luis (Vaz) de (also Camoëns /'kæməʊˌens/) (*c.*1524–80), Portuguese poet. Little is known of his early life; in 1553 he travelled to India and the Far East, returning to Portugal in 1570. His most famous work The Lusiads (1572) describes Vasco da Gama's voyage and discovery of the sea route to India and celebrates the golden age of Portuguese discovery; combining classical elements with a strong sense of Portuguese history and identity, it became established from the 17th century as Portugal's national epic.

camomile /'kæməˌmaɪl/ n. (also chamomile) an aromatic composite plant with daisy-like flowers, esp. Chamaemulum nobile. □ camomile tea an infusion of the dried flowers of C. nobile, used as a tonic or a drink. Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament (abbr. CND) a British organization which campaigns for the abolition of nuclear weapons worldwide and calls for unilateral disarmament by the West. It was founded in 1958 under the presidency of Bertrand Russell. After a period of dormancy in the late 1960s and 1970s, the campaign was revived in 1979 to oppose the siting of US cruise missiles in Britain, drawing huge crowds to demonstrations in London. With the improvement in East–West relations and the breakup of the Soviet Union, the organization has had a lower public profile.

Campbell^1 /'kæmb(ə)l/, Donald (Malcolm) (1921–67), English motor-racing driver and holder of world speed records. Following in the footsteps of his father Sir Malcolm Campbell, he broke a number of world speed records in boats and cars named Bluebird. In 1964 he achieved a speed of 276.33 m.p.h. (445 k.p.h.) on water and 403 m.p.h. (649 k.p.h.) on land, both in Australia. He was killed in an attempt to achieve a water speed of 300 m.p.h. (483 k.p.h.) on Coniston Water in England.

Campbell^2 /'kæmb(ə)l/, Sir Malcolm (1885–1948), English motor-racing driver and holder of world speed records. In 1935 he became the first man to exceed a land speed of 300 m.p.h. (483 k.p.h.), driving his car Bluebird on Bonneville Flats in Utah in the US, a record which was not broken until 1950. He also achieved a water-speed record of 141.74 m.p.h. (228 k.p.h.) in his boat of the same name in 1939.

Campbell^3 /'kæmb(ə)l/, Mrs Patrick (née Beatrice Stella Tanner) (1865–1940), English actress. Renowned for her wit and beauty, she created the part of Paula in Pinero's The Second Mrs Tanqueray (1893) and also gave notable performances in roles ranging from Shakespeare to Ibsen. George Bernard Shaw wrote the part of Eliza Doolittle in Pygmalion (1914) for her and they exchanged letters over a long period.

Campbell^4 /'kæmb(ə)l/, (Ignatius) Roy(ston Dunnachie) (1901–57), South African poet. His works include The Flaming Terrapin (1924), an allegorical narrative of the Flood, and The Wayzgoose (1928), a satire on South African life. His first autobiography Broken Record (1934) and the long poem Flowering Rifle (1939) show strong right-wing sympathies; he fought for Franco's side in the Spanish Civil War.

▪ Storage of food in cans or tins was introduced in the 19th century. In 1810 a French confectioner, Nicholas Appert, began to supply preserved food to the French army. Food was heated in glass jars which were then sealed until use. The reason for its effectiveness was not known until the work of Louis Pasteur: heat destroyed the micro-organisms present in food, and sealing prevented others from entering. Tin-coated steel containers, still the most common type, were developed by Bryan Donkin and introduced in the 1830s. Lids were soldered until the early 20th century, when a method was devised of sealing the cover to the can. Can-openers were not invented until the mid-19th century; the first cans were opened with a hammer and chisel.

Canada /'kænədə/ the second largest country in the world, covering the entire northern half of North America with the exception of Alaska; pop. (1991) 26,832,400; official languages, English and French; capital, Ottawa. Native peoples had inhabited all of Canada for several thousand years; they now form about two per cent of the population. The first European visitors were Vikings, who briefly settled in Newfoundland in about 1000. John Cabot reached the east coast in 1497, Jacques Cartier explored the St Lawrence in 1535, and Samuel de Champlain founded Quebec in 1608 and penetrated the interior (1609–16). Eastern Canada was colonized by the French in the 17th century, with the British emerging as the ruling colonial power in 1763, after the Seven Years War. Canada became a federation of provinces with dominion status in 1867, and the last step in attaining legal independence from the UK was taken with the signing of the Constitution Act of 1982. Canada is a member of the Commonwealth, and played a major role on the side of the Allies in each of the two world wars. Throughout the late 19th and early 20th centuries the vast Canadian West was gradually opened up, but the country remains sparsely populated for its size. French-speakers are largely concentrated in Quebec, the focal point for the French-Canadian nationalist movement, with minorities in other provinces.

▪ Examples of irrigation canals date from the 5th millennium BC in Mesopotamia. Early canals are also to be found in Egypt and in China, where the Grand Canal, 1,700 km (1,060 miles) in length, was begun in the 4th–5th centuries BC and completed in 1327. Many notable canals are designed to shorten sea passages: in France the Canal du Midi joined the Atlantic and Mediterranean in 1681, the Suez Canal joined the latter to the Red Sea in 1869, and in 1914 the Panama Canal joined the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. In England canals were the arteries of the Industrial Revolution, greatly reducing the cost of transport to below that of land transport over inadequate roads.

James Brindley and Thomas Telford were the great canal builders between 1760 and 1840, by which time a network of some 6,800 km (4,250 miles) of canal was in existence. Thereafter canal use declined in Britain, owing to the expansion of the railways and the restricted size of the early canals, but in Europe and North America canal use has grown in route length and in size of vessels, while in Britain canals have recently become increasingly popular as recreational waterways. The Rhine, Main, and Danube were linked in 1992, creating a canal connecting the North Sea with the Black Sea, while the Great Lakes are accessible to ocean-going vessels through the St Lawrence Seaway.

Canaletto /ˌkænəˈletəʊ/ (born Giovanni Antonio Canale) (1697–1768), Italian painter. Working chiefly in his native city of Venice, he was especially popular with the English aristocracy, who commissioned his paintings of Venetian festivals and scenery as mementoes of their grand tour. His early work is dramatic and freely handled, reflecting his training as a theatrical scene painter, but from *c.*1730 he changed to the more topographically precise style for which he is mainly remembered, aided by his use of the camera obscura. His works include Scene in Venice: The Piazzetta Entrance to the Grand Canal (*c.*1726–8).

- Cancer is a disorder of the processes of growth, development, and repair, in which there is uncontrolled growth of cells which differ morphologically and biochemically from the normal cells of the tissue of origin. The normal control mechanisms do not operate, and cancer cells tend both to infiltrate neighbouring tissues and to spread to distant parts of the body, forming secondary growths or metastases. Many kinds of cancer are known, affecting different parts of the body; some are known to be caused by external factors such as exposure to certain chemicals, ionizing radiation, and pathogenic organisms. Various forms of therapy such as surgery, chemotherapy, and radiation treatment have been used with differing degrees of success.

cannibalism /ˈkænɪbəˌlɪz(ə)m/ n. the eating of the flesh of members of one's own species. Archaeological evidence suggests that cannibalism among humans has occurred since palaeolithic times in many places throughout the world, although now, if it exists at all, it is limited to isolated parts of Melanesia and South America. Cannibalism is associated with ritual, religious, or magical beliefs far more than it is with hunger, and occasions such as when the starving survivors of an air crash have resorted to cannibalism are extremely rare. Anthropologists distinguish two categories of cannibalism: endocannibalism, in which the remains of relatives or other members of one's own group are consumed, generally out of respect and reverence; and exocannibalism, in which the remains of one's enemies are consumed, as a form of ritualized vengeance or with the aim of absorbing the vitality or other qualities of vanquished foes. The particular organs or portions consumed have frequently had ritual significance.

cannikin /ˈkænɪkɪn/ n. a small can. [Du. kanneken (as CAN^{2}, -KIN)]

Canning /ˈkænɪŋ/, George (1770–1827), British Tory statesman, Prime Minister 1827. Foreign Secretary from 1807, he resigned in 1809 after a disagreement with his rival Castlereagh over a disastrous expedition in the Napoleonic Wars, but returned to office following Castlereagh's suicide in 1822. During this ministry he presided over a reversal of Britain's hitherto conservative foreign policy, being particularly responsible for the support of nationalist movements in various parts of Europe. He succeeded Lord Liverpool as Prime Minister in 1827, but died shortly afterwards.

Cannizzaro /ˌkænɪˈzɑːrəʊ/, Stanislao (1826–1910), Italian chemist. He is chiefly remembered for his revival of Avogadro's hypothesis, using it to distinguish clearly between atoms and molecules, and introducing the unified system of atomic and molecular weights. Cannizzaro also discovered a reaction (named after him) in which an aldehyde is converted into an acid and an alcohol in the presence of a strong alkali.

▪ The term was originally applied to a small open boat used by West Indian aboriginals, which was hollowed out of a single tree-trunk. It was extended to embrace similar craft, in which paddles were the motive force, all over the world: some of these (particularly among the Pacific islands) were remarkably large vessels in which two banks of paddlers, up to twenty or thirty a side, were used. In the West canoeing was popularized as a sport in the mid-19th century, and today fibre-glass or wood canoes are commonly used for recreation.

capital punishment n. infliction of death by an authorized public authority as punishment for a crime. It was recognized by ancient legal systems, methods of execution varying from drowning in Babylon, stoning among the Hebrews, to strangulation, exposure to wild beasts, or crucifixion in Rome. In medieval Europe hanging and beheading were the usual methods; religious heretics were burnt at the stake. In more recent times, hanging was used in Britain, the guillotine in France, and the garrotte in Spain; in the US the chief methods of execution have been the electric chair and the gas chamber. In the 19th century in Britain the death penalty, previously available for a wide range of offences (some quite trivial), was restricted to cases of treason and murder, and in 1965 it was abolished for murder. Many countries, particularly in the West, have abolished the penalty, but it is retained in Russia and China and its use is becoming more common again in some states of the US. Regular calls for its restoration are made in Britain, despite the danger of executing a wrongly convicted person and the lack of conclusive evidence that it functions as a deterrent to criminals.

▪ The first self-propelled road vehicle was a steam-driven carriage designed and built in France by Nicholas-Joseph Cugnot (1725–1804) in 1769; other pioneers included Richard Trevithick. In Britain development clashed with the interests of the railway promoters, who used their influence to secure a highly restrictive law (1865) which required every power-driven road vehicle to have a man walking 100 yards in front with a red flag by day and a red lantern by night; the provisions of this law were not abolished until 1896. On the Continent, however, progress was being made with the internal-combustion engine, which Daimler fitted to a cycle and Benz to a three-wheeled vehicle (1885) that carried two passengers. Early cars were very small two-seat carts, with no roofs, poor springs, and wooden- or wire-spoked wheels. The car became a significant social phenomenon when mass production was introduced in the early 20th century, by pioneers such as Henry Ford. Cars are now ubiquitous in industrialized countries and exercise an overriding influence on the development of land. Alternatives to oil-based fuels, such as electric batteries or solar power, have not yet been sufficiently viable to challenge the dominance of the internal-combustion engine.

An important figure in the transition from late mannerism to baroque, he reinvigorated religious art and had a far-reaching influence on later artists. The characteristic features of his work include naturalistic realism (achieved partly by the use of ordinary people as models for biblical characters) and dramatic use of light and shade.

caravan /ˈkærəˌvæn/ n. & v. ● n. 1 a Brit. a vehicle equipped for living in and usu. towed by a motor vehicle or a horse. b US a covered motor vehicle equipped for living in. 2 a company of merchants or pilgrims etc. travelling together, esp. across a desert in Asia or North Africa. 3 a covered cart or carriage. ● v.intr. (caravanned, caravanning) travel or live in a caravan. ☐ caravan site (or park) a place where caravans are parked as dwellings, often with special amenities. ☐ caravanner n. [F caravane f. caraway /ˈkærəˌweɪ/ n. an umbelliferous plant, Carum carvi, bearing clusters of tiny white flowers. □ caraway seed its fruit used as flavouring and as a source of oil. [prob. OSp. alcarahueya f. Arab. alkarāwiyā, perh. f. Gk karon, kareon cumin] carb /kɑːb/ n. colloq. a carburettor. [abbr.]

carbamate /ˈkɑːbəˌmeɪt/ n. Chem. a salt or ester of an amide of carbonic acid. Some carbamates are important as insecticides. [CARBONIC + AMIDE] carbide /ˈkɑːbaɪd/ n. Chem. a binary compound of carbon.

carbie /ˈkɑːbɪ/ n. (also carby) Austral. colloq. a carburettor. [abbr.]

carbine /ˈkɑːbaɪn/ n. a short firearm, usu. a rifle, orig. for cavalry use. [F carabine (this form also earlier in Engl.), weapon of the carabin mounted musketeer] carbo- /ˈkɑːbəʊ/ comb. form carbon (carbohydrate; carbolic; carboxyl).

carbohydrate /ˌkɑːbəˈhaɪdreɪt/ n. Biochem. any of a large group of energy-producing organic compounds containing carbon, hydrogen, and oxygen, e.g. starch, glucose, and other sugars.

carbolic /kɑːˈbɒlɪk/ n. (in full carbolic acid) phenol, esp. when used as a disinfectant. □ carbolic soap soap containing this. [CARBO- + -OL + -IC] carbon /ˈkɑːb(ə)n/ n. 1 a non-metallic chemical element (atomic number 6; symbol C). (See note below.) 2 a = carbon copy. b = carbon paper. 3 a rod of carbon in an arc lamp. □ carbon black a fine carbon powder made by burning hydrocarbons in insufficient air. carbon copy 1 a copy made with carbon paper. 2 a person or thing identical or similar to another (is a carbon copy of his father). carbon cycle 1 Biol. the continuous transfer of carbon compounds from the atmosphere to living organisms through plant photosynthesis, and back to the atmosphere by respiration and decay. 2 Physics a cycle of thermonuclear reactions believed to occur in stars, in which carbon nuclei are repeatedly formed and broken down in the conversion of hydrogen into helium. carbon dating the determination of the age of an organic object from the ratio of isotopes which changes as carbon-14 decays (see RADIOCARBON). carbon dioxide a colourless odourless gas (chem. formula: CO_2) occurring naturally in the atmosphere and formed by respiration. carbon disulphide a colourless liquid (chem. formula: CS_2) used as a solvent. carbon fibre a thin strong crystalline filament of carbon used as strengthening material in resins, ceramics, etc. carbon-14 a long-lived radioactive carbon isotope of mass 14, used in radiocarbon dating and as a tracer in biochemistry. carbon microphone a microphone depending for its action on the varying electrical resistance of carbon granules. carbon monoxide a colourless odourless toxic gas (chem. formula: CO) formed by the incomplete burning of carbon. carbon paper a thin carbon-coated paper used for making (esp. typed) copies. carbon steel a steel with properties dependent on the percentage of carbon present. carbon tax a tax on the carbon emissions that result from burning fossil fuels (e.g. in motor vehicles) because of their contribution to the greenhouse effect. carbon tetrachloride a colourless volatile liquid (chem. formula: CCl_4) used as a solvent. carbon-12 the principal stable isotope of carbon, of mass 12. [F carbone f. L carbo -onis charcoal]

- Pure carbon exists in two allotropic forms, diamond and graphite. The element also occurs in impure form as charcoal, soot, coke, coal, and related materials; molecules consisting of hollow cages of carbon atoms (fullerenes) have recently been discovered. Carbon has many economic uses, but its unique significance is that its compounds form the physical basis of all living organisms. Carbon has the property of linking with itself and other elements to form molecules consisting of rings or long chains of atoms, and an immense variety of compounds exist. The chemistry of such compounds found in living things or their remains was once thought to obey laws different from those governing other substances, whence the original separation of organic chemistry as a distinct subject.

carbonaceous /ˌkɑːbəˈneɪʃəs/ adj. 1 consisting of or containing carbon. 2 of or like coal or charcoal.

carbonade /ˌkɑːbəˈneɪd/ n. a rich beef stew made with onions and beer. [F] carbonado /ˌkɑːbəˈneɪdəʊ/ n. (pl. -os) a dark opaque or impure kind of diamond used as an abrasive, for drills etc. [Port.]

carbonate /ˈkɑːbəˌneɪt/ n. & v. ● n. Chem. a salt of carbonic acid. ● v.tr. 1 impregnate with carbon dioxide; aerate. 2 convert into a carbonate. □ carbonation /ˌkɑːbəˈneɪʃ(ə)n/ n. [F carbonat f. mod.L carbonatum (as CARBON)] carbonic /kɑːˈbɒnɪk/ adj. Chem. containing carbon. □ carbonic acid a very weak acid formed from carbon dioxide dissolved in water. carbonic acid gas archaic carbon dioxide.

carboniferous /ˌkɑːbəˈnɪfərəs/ adj. & n. ● adj. 1 producing coal. 2 (Carboniferous) Geol. of or relating to a period of the Palaeozoic era. (See note below.) ● n. (Carboniferous) Geol. this period or the corresponding geological system.

- The Carboniferous period lasted from about 360 to 286 million years BP, between the Devonian and the Permian. During this period seed-bearing plants appeared, corals were widespread, and extensive limestone deposits were formed. Rivers formed deltas, and luxuriant vegetation developed on coastal swamps. This vegetation was later drowned and buried under mud and sand, and subsequently became coal.

carbonize /ˈkɑːbəˌnaɪz/ v.tr. (also -ise) 1 convert into carbon by heating. 2 reduce to charcoal or coke. 3 coat with carbon. □ carbonization /ˌkɑːbənaɪˈzeɪʃ(ə)n/ n.

carbonyl /ˈkɑːbəˌnaɪl, -nɪl/ n. (used attrib.) Chem. the divalent radical :CO. □ carbonyl chloride = PHOSGENE.

carborundum /ˌkɑːbəˈrʌndəm/ n. a compound of carbon and silicon used esp. as an abrasive. [CARBON + CORUNDUM] carboxyl /kɑːˈbɒksaɪl, -sɪl/ n. Chem. the univalent acid radical (–COOH), present in most organic acids. [CARBON + OXYGEN + -YL] carboxylic acid /ˌkɑːbɒkˈsɪlɪk/ n. Chem. an organic acid containing the carboxyl group. □ carboxylate /kɑːˈbɒksɪˌleɪt/ n.

carboy /ˈkɑːbɔɪ/ n. a large globular glass bottle usu. protected by a frame, for containing liquids. [Pers. ḳarāba large glass flagon] carbuncle /ˈkɑːbʌŋk(ə)l/ n. 1 a severe abscess in the skin. 2 a bright red gem. □ carbuncular /kɑːˈbʌŋkjʊlə(r)/ adj. [ME f. OF charbucle etc. f. L carbunculus small coal f. carbo coal]

carburation /ˌkɑːbjʊˈreɪʃ(ə)n/ n. the process of charging air with a spray of liquid hydrocarbon fuel, esp. in an internal-combustion engine. [as CARBURET] carburet /ˌkɑːbjʊˈret/ v.tr. (carburetted, carburetting; US carbureted, carbureting) combine (a gas etc.) with carbon. [earlier carbure f. F f. L carbo (as CARBON)] carburettor /ˌkɑːbjʊˈretə(r), ˌkɑːbəˈretə(r)/ n. (also carburetter, US carburetor /ˈkɑːbjʊˌreɪtə(r)/) an apparatus for carburation of petrol and air in an internal-combustion engine. [as CARBURET + -OR^1] carburize /ˈkɑːbjʊˌraɪz/ v.tr. (also -ise) add carbon to (iron). □ carburization /ˌkɑːbjʊraɪˈzeɪʃ(ə)n/ n. [f. CARBURET] carby var. of CARBIE.

carcajou /ˈkɑːkəˌdʒuː, -ˌʒuː/ n. N. Amer. = WOLVERINE. [F, app. Algonquian (cf. KINKAJOU)] carcass /ˈkɑːkəs/ n. (also carcase) 1 the dead body of an animal, esp. a trunk for cutting up as meat. 2 the bones of a cooked bird. 3 derog. the human body, living or dead. 4 the skeleton or framework of a building, ship, etc. 5 worthless remains. □ carcass meat raw meat as distinct from canned or tinned meat. Carlyle /kɑːˈlaɪl/, Thomas (1795–1881), Scottish historian and political philosopher. He worked as a teacher before starting to write articles for the Edinburgh Encyclopedia and critical works on German literature in the 1820s. His first major philosophical work was Sartor Resartus (1833–4), which dealt with social values and is written in a mannered prose style. He established his reputation as a historian with his history of the French Revolution (1837), the first volume of which he was forced to rewrite after the manuscript was accidentally burnt. Many of his works on history, politics, and social philosophy advocate a benevolent autocracy rather than democracy; On Heroes, Hero Worship, and the Heroic in History (1841) was the starting-point for his development of these ideas. Carlyle's influence on the development of social and political ideas in Britain during the 19th century was considerable.

Cassini /kə'si:nɪ/, Giovanni Domenico (1625–1712), Italian-born

French astronomer. He helped to establish the Paris Observatory and became its director, specializing in the solar system. He determined the rotational periods of Jupiter and Saturn, calculated the movements of the Galilean moons of Jupiter, discovered four of the moons of Saturn, and described a gap in the rings of Saturn (now known as Cassini's division). Cassini also contributed to geodesy, but wrongly believed the shape of the earth to be a prolate spheroid, a theory supported by the three generations of his descendants who succeeded him at the Paris Observatory.

(See SOCIAL.) □ caste mark a symbol on the forehead denoting a person's caste. lose caste descend in the social order. [Sp. and Port. casta lineage, race, breed, fem. of casto pure, CHASTE]

▪ The term occurs first in Spanish, but was applied by the Portuguese in the 16th century to the rigid social divisions found in the Indian subcontinent. Although the caste system applies in particular to Hindus, it extends also to other religious groups such as Christians and Muslims. Castes are associated with different levels of purity and pollution. They are traditionally defined by occupation but are also linked with geographical location and (esp. dietary) customs; members marry within their caste and have strictly defined social relations with members of other castes. Hinduism recognizes four broad classes or varnas (Brahman, Kshatriya, Vaisya, and Sudra: priests, warriors, merchants and farmers, and labourers), based on the varnas of the ancient Aryans. Within each of these are many castes; the lowest caste, that of the Harijans or untouchables, is outside the varna system, and its members often suffer extreme discrimination, despite recent attempts at positive discrimination in their favour.

Castro /'kæstrəʊ/, Fidel (b.1927), Cuban statesman, Prime Minister 1959–76 and President since 1976. He forced President Batista from power in 1959, setting up a Communist regime which he has led ever since. The abortive US-backed invasion attempt by Cuban exiles at the Bay of Pigs in 1961 boosted his popularity, as did his successful survival of the Cuban Missile Crisis of 1962. He became leader of the Non-Aligned Movement in 1979, in spite of Cuba's reliance on the USSR for economic aid. Since the collapse of the Soviet bloc Castro has strictly maintained Communism in Cuba.

- Catacombs, notably those under the city of Rome, were used by the early Christians for the reception of their dead. Since Roman legislation regarded every burial place as sacrosanct, Christians were able to hide in them during the era of the persecutions, and their violation was extremely rare. Having been long covered up and forgotten, the catacombs around Rome were fortuitously discovered in 1578; the stucco paintings which often covered the walls are the earliest surviving examples of Christian art.

Cather /ˈkæðə(r)/, Willa (Sibert) (1876–1974), American novelist and short-story writer. The state of Nebraska, where she was brought up, provides the setting for some of her best writing; early major novels include O Pioneers! (1913), The Song of the Lark (1915), and My Antonia (1918), while among later works is the best-selling Death Comes for the Archbishop (1927), a celebration of the Catholic Church in New Mexico.

Catherine II /ˈkæθrɪn/, (known as Catherine the Great) (1729–96), empress of Russia, reigned 1762–96. A German princess, she was made empress following a plot which deposed her husband Peter III (1728–62). Her attempted social and political reforms were impeded by entrenched aristocratic interests, and in later years her reign became increasingly conservative. Under Catherine Russia played an important part in European affairs, participating in the three partitions of Poland and forming close links with Prussia and Austria, while to the south and east further territorial advances were made at the expense of the Turks and Tartars.

Catherine, St (known as St Catherine of Alexandria) (died *c.*307), early Christian martyr. Traditionally, she opposed the persecution of Christians under the Roman emperor Maxentius, debated with fifty scholars sent to undermine her position, and refused to recant or to marry the emperor. She is then said to have been tortured on a spiked wheel and beheaded when it broke. The Catherine wheel subsequently became her emblem. Feast day, 25 Nov.

Catherine de' Medici (1519–89), queen of France. The wife of Henry II of France, Catherine ruled as regent 1560–74 during the minority reigns of their three sons, Francis II (reigned 1559–60), Charles IX (reigned 1560–74), and Henry III (reigned 1574–89). She proved unable or unwilling to control the confused situation during the French Wars of Religion, and it was on her instigation that Huguenots were killed in the Massacre of St Bartholomew (1572).

Catherine of Aragon (1485–1536), first wife of Henry VIII, youngest daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella of Castile, mother of Mary I. Originally married to Henry's elder brother Arthur in 1501, she was widowed six months later, and married Henry in 1509. She gave birth to five children, but all except her daughter Mary died in infancy. Concerned about Catherine's failure to produce a male heir, and attracted to Anne Boleyn, Henry attempted to divorce his wife on the debatable grounds that her marriage to his brother made the marriage illegal. Catherine was sent into retirement, but neither she nor the pope accepted the annulment of the marriage, which led eventually to England's break with the Roman Catholic Church.

cathode ray n. a beam of electrons emitted from the cathode of a high-vacuum discharge tube. The study of high-voltage electrical discharges through gases at low pressure in the late 19th century revealed that a highly energetic radiation was being emitted from the region of the cathode or negative terminal of the tube. J. J. Thomson in 1897 established that cathode rays consisted of streams of high-velocity electrons. Cathode-ray tubes are used widely in television receivers and other visual display units. The modern television tube, for example, is an advanced form of cathode-ray tube producing electrons by evaporation from a heated cathode. The electrons are accelerated and focused by the anode, and fall on a fluorescent screen where they produce pinpoints of light. The electron beam is made to follow a scanning pattern which covers the whole screen. Application of a positive or negative potential (e.g. a video signal) to a metal grid or mesh inserted between cathode and anode has the effect of varying the intensity of the beam so as to build up an image on the screen.

cathode-ray tube /ˌkæθəʊdˈreɪ/ n. (abbr. CRT) a high-vacuum discharge tube in which cathode rays are made to produce a luminous image on a fluorescent screen.

Catholic Emancipation the granting of full political and civil liberties to Roman Catholics in Britain and Ireland. Although religious toleration had been practised since the late 17th century, Catholics were barred from holding public office and restricted in many other ways under the Penal Laws and Test Acts. Many of the restrictions were lifted in 1791, and heavy pressure was applied from Ireland after the Act of Union (1801) for the admission of Catholics to Parliament; the issue was fiercely debated, but emancipation was strongly opposed by George III. The election to Parliament of Daniel O'Connell in 1828 led to the passing of the Catholic Emancipation Act of 1829, which repealed most of the discriminatory laws. (See also PENAL LAWS, TEST ACTS.)

Cato /ˈkeɪtəʊ/, Marcus Porcius (known as Cato the Elder or Cato the Censor) (234–149 BC), Roman statesman, orator, and writer. An implacable enemy of Carthage, he fought in the second Punic War as a young man and continually warned against the Carthaginian threat when a senator. As censor in 184 BC he engaged in a vigorous programme of moral and social reform, and attempted to stem the growing influence of Greek culture on Roman life. His many writings include a lost history of Rome and an extant work on agriculture. His great-grandson, Cato the Younger (95–46 BC), was an opponent of the dictatorial ambitions of Julius Caesar.

- Cattle were domesticated from the wild ox or aurochs in neolithic times, certainly before 3000 BC and possibly as early as 7000 BC. They were first kept for meat and hides, and their early use as draught animals transformed agriculture. Milk yields were slowly increased by selective breeding, and later breeds of dairy cattle became perhaps the most important of domestic animals. The Brahman or zebu was developed in India, where it is held sacred by Hindus, and has been extensively cross-bred with western breeds.

Catullus /kəˈtʌləs/, Gaius Valerius (*c.*84–*c.*54 BC), Roman poet. His one book of verse contains poems in a variety of metres on a range of subjects; he is best known for his poems to a married woman addressed as 'Lesbia', although he also wrote a number of longer mythological pieces. His importance for later Latin poetry lies both in the impetus he gave to the development of the love-elegy and in his cultivation of an Alexandrian refinement and learning.

celestial /sɪˈlestɪəl/ adj. 1 heavenly; divinely good or beautiful; sublime. 2 of the sky, or of outer space as observed in astronomy etc. □ celestial body the sun, the moon, a planet, a star, etc. celestial coordinate Astron. either of two coordinates, declination and right ascension, that define a position on the celestial sphere. celestial equator Astron. the great circle of the sky in the plane perpendicular to the earth's axis. celestial horizon see HORIZON 1c. celestial mechanics Astron. the mathematical description of the positions and motions of celestial bodies on the celestial sphere. celestial navigation navigation by the stars etc. celestial sphere Astron. the abstract sphere of unit radius on which the positions of celestial objects are projected to form a map of the heavens, whose poles and equator are projections of the corresponding terrestrial features. □ celestially adv. [ME f. OF f. med.L caelestialis f. L caelestis: see CELESTE] celestial pole n. Astron. the point on the celestial sphere directly above the earth's geographic pole (north or south), around which the stars and planets appear to rotate during the course of the night. The north celestial pole is currently within one degree of the star Polaris, but because of precession it appears to trace out a circle on the celestial sphere over a period of some 26,000 years.

celiac US var. of COELIAC.

celibate /ˈselɪbət/ adj. & n. ● adj. 1 committed to abstention from sexual relations and from marriage, esp. for religious reasons. 2 abstaining from sexual relations. ● n. a celibate person. □ celibacy n. [F célibat or L caelibatus unmarried state f. caelebs -ibis unmarried] cell /sel/ n. 1 a small room, esp. in a prison or monastery. 2 a small compartment, e.g. in a honeycomb. 3 a small group as a nucleus of political activity, esp. of a subversive kind. 4 hist. a small monastery or nunnery dependent on a larger one. 5 Biol. a the structural and functional unit of which organisms consist. (See note below.) b an enclosed cavity in an organism etc. 6 Electr. a vessel for containing electrodes within an electrolyte for current-generation or electrolysis. □ cell wall Biol. the rigid layer that encloses a plant or bacterial cell. □ celled adj. (also in comb.). [ME f. OF celle or f. L cella storeroom etc.]

▪ Nearly all organisms are composed of cells (the simplest consist of a single cell), which are microscopic structures bounded by a membrane and capable of metabolism, self-repair, and reproduction. There are two basic types of cell: those of prokaryotes (bacteria and blue-green algae), which lack nuclei and other distinct structures, and those of eukaryotes (animals and plants), which are larger and more complex and have the genetic material (DNA) contained in a membrane-bound nucleus. The cytoplasm of eukaryotic cells contains various specialized structures (organelles), such as mitochondria. The membrane of a cell regulates the exchange of materials with its environment. In large organisms such as humans there are many specialized types of cell lacking some of the features described above; for example, red blood cells have no nuclei. Most plant cells have a thick wall of cellulose outside the cell membrane, a large fluid-filled cavity within the cytoplasm, and (in green plants) structures that contain chlorophyll.

cellar /ˈselə(r)/ n. & v. ● n. 1 a room below ground level in a house, used for storage, esp. of wine or coal. 2 a stock of wine in a cellar (has a good cellar). ● v.tr. store or put in a cellar. [ME f. AF celer, OF celier f. LL cellarium storehouse] cellarage /ˈselərɪdʒ/ n. 1 cellar accommodation. 2 the charge for the use of a cellar or storehouse.

cellarer /ˈselərə(r)/ n. a monastic officer in charge of wine.

cellaret /ˌseləˈret/ n. a case or sideboard for holding wine bottles in a dining-room.

Cellini /tʃɪˈliːnɪ/, Benvenuto (1500–71), Italian goldsmith and sculptor. His work is characterized by its elaborate virtuosity; the salt-cellar of gold and enamel which he made while working for Francis I of France is an outstanding example and typifies the late Renaissance style. The latter part of his life was spent in Florence, where he cast the bronze Perseus (1545–54), regarded as his masterpiece. His autobiography is famous for its racy style and its vivid picture of Italian Renaissance life.

Cellnet /ˈselnet/ n. propr. a cellular telephone service.

cello /ˈtʃeləʊ/ n. (pl. -os) a large bass to tenor instrument of the violin family, played while being held upright on the floor between the legs of the seated player. It is a standard member of the orchestra and of string quartets, while its four-octave range and deep, expressive tone make it an ideal solo instrument, for which there is a large repertoire. □ cellist n. [abbr. of VIOLONCELLO]

Cellophane /ˈseləˌfeɪn/ n. propr. a thin transparent wrapping material made from viscose, first produced in Switzerland in 1908. [CELLULOSE + -phane (cf. DIAPHANOUS)] cellphone /ˈselfəʊn/ n. a small portable radio-telephone having access to a cellular radio system.

cellular /ˈseljʊlə(r)/ adj. 1 of or having small compartments or cavities. 2 of open texture; porous. 3 Physiol. of or consisting of cells. 4 designating or relating to a mobile telephone system that uses a number of short-range radio stations to cover the area it serves, the signal being automatically switched from one station to another as the user travels about. □ cellular blanket a blanket of open texture. cellular plant a plant with no distinct stem, leaves, etc. cellular radio a system of mobile radio-telephone transmission with an area divided into 'cells' each served by its own small transmitter. □ cellulous adj. cellulate /-lət/ adj. cellularity /ˌseljʊˈlærɪtɪ/ n. cellulation /-ˈleɪʃ(ə)n/ n. [F cellulaire f. mod.L cellularis: see CELLULE] cellule /ˈseljuːl/ n. Biol. a small cell or cavity. [F cellule or L cellula dimin. of cella CELL]

cellulite /ˈseljʊˌlaɪt/ n. a lumpy form of fat, esp. on the hips and thighs of women, causing puckering of the skin. [F (as CELLULE)] cellulitis /ˌseljʊˈlaɪtɪs/ n. inflammation of subcutaneous connective tissue.

celluloid /ˈseljʊˌlɔɪd/ n. 1 a transparent flammable plastic made from camphor and cellulose nitrate. 2 cinema film. [CELLULOSE + -OID] cellulose /ˈseljʊˌləʊz, -ˌləʊs/ n. 1 Biochem. a carbohydrate forming the main constituent of plant-cell walls. (See note below.) 2 (in general use) a paint or lacquer consisting of esp. cellulose acetate or nitrate in solution. □ cellulose acetate the cellulose ester of acetic acid, widely used as an artificial fibre or plastic. cellulose nitrate = NITROCELLULOSE. □ cellulosic /ˌseljʊˈləʊsɪk/ adj. [F (as CELLULE)]

▪ Cellulose, the main structural material of plants, has a molecular structure consisting of long unbranched chains of glucose molecules. It is a major constituent of wood, from which it is produced industrially. Paper and plant-based textile fibres such as cotton consist largely of cellulose, and in chemically modified forms it is used to make rayon, some plastics, and other products. It is important in the human diet as a constituent of dietary fibre.

celom US var. of COELOM.

Celsius^1 /ˈselsɪəs/, Anders (1701–44), Swedish astronomer, best known for his thermometer scale. He was professor of astronomy at Uppsala, and joined an expedition to measure a meridian in the north, which verified Newton's theory that the earth is flattened at the poles. In 1742 he advocated a metric temperature scale with 100° as the freezing-point of water and 0° as the boiling-point; however, the thermometer which was actually introduced at the Uppsala Observatory had its scale reversed.

Celsius^2 /ˈselsɪəs/ adj. of or denoting a temperature on the Celsius scale. □ Celsius scale a scale of temperature on which water freezes at 0° and boils at 100° under standard conditions (also called centigrade). [CELSIUS^1]

Celt /kelt/ n. a member of a group of peoples who occupied a large part of western Europe in the Iron Age, including the pre-Roman inhabitants of Britain and Gaul and their descendants. The culture of the Celts can be traced back to the Bronze Age of the upper Danube in the 13th century BC, with successive stages represented by the urnfield and Hallstatt cultures. Spreading over western and central Europe from perhaps as early as 900 BC, they reached the height of their power in the La Tène period of the 5th–1st centuries BC; they sacked Rome in 390 BC before being conquered by the Romans and by Germanic tribes and confined largely to Gaul and the British Isles. Today their languages survive in Ireland, Scotland, Wales, and Brittany. The Celts made significant developments in agriculture and metal-working: they cultivated fields on a regular basis with ox-drawn ploughs in place of manual implements, and have left much fine jewellery and metalwork. [L Celtae (pl.) f. Gk Keltoi]

celt /kelt/ n. Archaeol. a stone or metal prehistoric implement with a chisel edge. [med.L celtes chisel]

Celtic /ˈkeltɪk, ˈsel-/ adj. & n. ● adj. of or relating to the Celts or their languages. ● n. a branch of the Indo-European language family, today spoken by some in parts of the British Isles and in Brittany. (See note below.) □ Celtic cross a Latin cross with a circle round the centre. □ Celticism /-tɪˌsɪz(ə)m/ n. [L celticus (as CELT) or F celtique]

▪ The Celtic languages are divided into three groups, Continental Celtic (including the dead languages of pre-Roman and early Roman Europe, such as Gaulish), Goidelic (including Irish, Scottish Gaelic, and Manx), and Brythonic (including Welsh, Cornish, and Breton). A characteristic feature of Celtic languages is lenition, in which the initial consonant of a word is pronounced differently depending on its syntactic role and the preceding word. Thus, the vocative of the Gaelic name Màiri /ˈmɑːrɪ/ is A Mhàiri /ə ˈvɑːrɪ/. (See also BRYTHONIC, GOIDELIC.)

Celtic Church the Christian Church in the British Isles from its foundation in the 2nd or 3rd century until its assimilation into the Roman Catholic Church. It was largely driven out of England by the Saxons in the 5th century, surviving in Scotland, Wales, and Ireland, from where it attempted to convert the invaders by means of missionaries. St Augustine's expedition from Rome in 597 refounded the Church in England but failed to reconcile the differences that had developed between the Celtic and Roman Churches; these were resolved by the Synod of Whitby in 664, a date which effectively marked the end of the Celtic Church in England, although it continued to exist in Wales, Scotland, and Ireland until about the 12th century.

Celtic Sea the part of the Atlantic Ocean between southern Ireland and SW England.

Central African Republic a country of central Africa; pop. (est. 1991) 3,113,000; languages, French (official), Sango; capital, Bangui. Formerly the French colony of Ubanghi Shari, it became a republic within the French Community in 1958 and a fully independent state in 1960. In 1976 its President, Jean Bédel Bokassa, declared himself emperor and changed the country's name to Central African Empire, but it reverted to the name of Republic after he was ousted in 1979.

Central America the southernmost part of North America linking the continent to South America and consisting of the countries of Guatemala, Belize, Honduras, El Salvador, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, and Panama.

Central American Common Market an economic organization comprising Guatemala, Honduras, El Salvador, Nicaragua, and Costa Rica, set up in 1960 to reduce trade barriers, stimulate exports, and encourage industrialization. It lost impetus in the 1970s and by the mid-1980s was in a state of suspension.

central bank n. a national bank that provides financial and banking services for its country's government and commercial banking system, as well as implementing the government's monetary policy and issuing currency. Major central banks include the Bank of England in the UK, the Federal Reserve Bank of the US, the Bundesbank in Germany, and France's Banque de France.

Central Command (abbr. CENTCOM or Centcom) a US military strike force consisting of units from the army, air force, and navy, established in 1979 (as the Rapid Deployment Force) to operate in the Middle East and North Africa. Led by Norman Schwarzkopf (b.1934), it was involved in the Gulf War of 1991.

Central Criminal Court see OLD BAILEY.

Central Intelligence Agency (abbr. CIA) a Federal agency in the US, established in 1947, responsible for coordinating government intelligence activities. It was developed for overseas use in the cold war, but has since figured in domestic operations. Abroad, the agency has been involved, amongst other operations, in the Bay of Pigs incident in Cuba (1961) and the coup against President Allende of Chile (1973).

centreboard /ˈsentəˌbɔːd/ n. (US centerboard) a board for lowering through a boat's keel to prevent leeway.

centrefold /ˈsentəˌfəʊld/ n. (US centerfold) 1 a printed and usu. illustrated sheet folded to form the centre spread of a magazine etc. 2 a model, usu. naked or scantily clad, pictured on such a spread.

centreing var. of CENTRING.

-centric /ˈsentrɪk/ comb. form forming adjectives with the sense 'having a (specified) centre' (anthropocentric; eccentric). [after concentric etc. f. Gk kentrikos: see CENTRE] centrifugal /senˈtrɪfjʊg(ə)l, ˌsentrɪˈfjuːg(ə)l/ adj. moving or tending to move outwards from a centre (cf. CENTRIPETAL). □ centrifugally adv. [mod.L centrifugus f. L centrum centre + fugere flee] centrifugal force n. an apparent force that acts outwards on a body moving about a centre. Centrifugal force is actually a manifestation of inertia. A body in uniform circular motion, e.g. at the end of a string fixed at the other end, is constantly accelerating because its direction of motion is always changing. The force causing this acceleration is actually centripetal and is manifested as tension in the string. If the string is cut (and the centripetal force ceases) the body will tend through inertia to move in a straight line at a tangent to its previous circular path. It is possible to assign a magnitude to the centrifugal force equal to that of the centripetal force.

centrifuge /ˈsentrɪˌfjuːdʒ/ n. & v. ● n. a container designed to rotate rapidly so as to apply centrifugal force to its contents, usu. in order to separate liquids from solids or other liquids (e.g. cream from milk). (See note below.) ● v.tr. 1 subject to the action of a centrifuge. 2 separate by centrifuge. □ centrifugation /ˌsentrɪfjʊˈgeɪʃ(ə)n/ n.

- Simple centrifuges consist of a mechanically driven bowl or cylinder which turns inside a stationary casing; most have buckets fixed at the ends of a precisely balanced rotor. In all centrifuges the components are impelled to the periphery, those of lesser density collecting nearer the middle or else passing through a filter and being removed. Ultracentrifuges, very fast machines able to create forces many thousands of times that of gravity, are used in biochemistry to precipitate colloidal materials and large molecules from solution. Centrifugal separation of gases has been used to separate uranium isotopes in the production of nuclear fuels.

centring /ˈsentrɪŋ/ (also centreing /ˈsentər-/, US centering) n. a temporary frame used to support an arch, dome, etc., while under construction.

centriole /ˈsentrɪˌəʊl/ n. Biol. a minute organelle usu. within a centrosome involved esp. in the development of spindles in cell division. [med.L centriolum dimin. of centrum centre] centripetal /senˈtrɪpɪt(ə)l, ˌsentrɪˈpiːt(ə)l/ adj. moving or tending to move towards a centre (cf. CENTRIFUGAL). □ centripetal force the force acting on a body causing it to move about a centre. □ centripetally adv. [mod.L centripetus f. L centrum centre + petere seek] centrist /ˈsentrɪst/ n. Polit. often derog. a person who holds moderate views. □ centrism n.

centromere /ˈsentrəˌmɪə(r)/ n. Biol. the point on a chromosome by which it is attached to the spindle during cell division. [L centrum centre + Gk meros part]

CFC abbr. Chem. chlorofluorocarbon, any of a class of usu. gaseous compounds of carbon, hydrogen, chlorine, and fluorine. CFCs are non-flammable, non-toxic, and unreactive synthetic compounds which have been used since the 1930s as working fluids in refrigerators and propellants for aerosol sprays. They have now been shown to be harmful to the earth's ozone layer, as well as being major contributors to the greenhouse effect, and their use is being reduced. CFC molecules which have been released into the environment are broken down by the sun's ultraviolet radiation in the upper atmosphere, forming chlorine which reacts with ozone.

chaos /ˈkeɪos/ n. 1 a utter confusion, disorder. b chaotic behaviour (CHAOTIC 2). 2 the formless matter supposed to have existed before the creation of the universe. [F or L f. Gk khaos: -otic after erotic etc.]

chaos theory n. the mathematical study of complex systems whose development is highly sensitive to slight changes in conditions, so that small events can give rise to strikingly great consequences. For example, a tiny disruption of the atmosphere in the Arctic Circle might lead to the development of a hurricane in the tropics. Such behaviour is in practice unpredictable beyond a short time-scale. Chaos theory, which has applications in physics, biology, ecology, economics, and other fields, has two main aspects. On the one hand, processes that seem random or irregular may actually follow discoverable laws. On the other hand, some processes that used to be thought predictable, e.g. the movements of bodies in the solar system, have been shown to be chaotic in the long term.

chaotic /keɪˈotɪk/ adj. 1 characterized by chaos, disorderly, confused. 2 (of a system or its behaviour) so unpredictable as to appear random, owing to great sensitivity to small changes in conditions. (See also CHAOS THEORY.) □ chaotically adv.

Charge of the Light Brigade a British cavalry charge in 1854 during the Battle of Balaclava in the Crimean War. A misunderstanding between the commander of the Light Brigade, Lord Cardigan, and his superiors, Lords Raglan and Lucan, led to the British cavalry being committed to an attack up a valley strongly held on three sides by the Russians. Immortalized in verse by Tennyson, the charge destroyed some of the finest light cavalry in the world to very little military purpose.

Charlemagne /ˈʃɑːləˌmeɪn/ (Latin Carolus Magnus Charles the Great) (742–814), king of the Franks 768–814 and Holy Roman emperor (as Charles I) 800–14. He created an empire by conquering and Christianizing the Lombards (774), Saxons (772–7; 782–5), and Avars (791–9), and restoring areas of Italy to the pope. His coronation by Pope Leo III in Rome on Christmas Day, 800, is taken as having inaugurated the Holy Roman Empire. He gave government new moral drive and religious responsibility, and encouraged commerce and agriculture. A well-educated man, he promoted the arts and education, and under Alcuin his principal court at Aachen became a major centre of learning. The political cohesion of his empire did not last, but the influence of his scholars persisted in the Carolingian Renaissance.

Charleroi /ˈʃɑːləˌrwʌ/ an industrial city in SW Belgium; pop. (1991) 206,200.

Charles^1 /tʃɑːlz/ the name of two kings of England, Scotland, and Ireland:

Charles I (1600–49), son of James I, reigned 1625–49. His reign was dominated by the deepening religious and constitutional crisis that eventually resulted in the English Civil War. His attempt to rule without Parliament (1629–40) eventually failed when he was obliged to recall Parliament to fund his war with Scotland; disputes with the new Parliament led to civil war in 1642. Charles surrendered to the Scots in 1646 and was handed over to Parliament in 1647. He escaped and made an alliance with the Scots in return for religious concessions, but the Royalist forces were defeated in 1648 and the Parliamentary army demanded Charles' death. He was tried by a special Parliamentary court and beheaded.

Charles II (1630–85), son of Charles I, reigned 1660–85. After his father's execution in 1649 Charles was declared king in Scotland and then crowned there in 1651, but was forced into exile the same year, when his army attempted to invade England and was defeated by Cromwell's forces at Worcester. He remained in exile on the Continent for nine years before he was restored after the collapse of Cromwell's regime. Charles displayed considerable adroitness in handling the difficult constitutional situation, but continuing religious and political strife dogged his reign. Although he failed to produce a legitimate heir, he moved to ensure the Protestant succession by arranging the marriage of his niece Mary to William of Orange.

Charles^2 /tʃɑːlz/ the name of four kings of Spain, notably:

Charles I (1500–58), son of Philip I, reigned 1516–56, Holy Roman emperor (as Charles V) 1519–56. He united the Spanish and imperial thrones when he inherited the latter in 1519. His reign was characterized by the struggle against Protestantism in Germany, by rebellion in Castile, and by war with France (1521–44). Exhausted by these struggles, Charles handed Naples, the Netherlands, and Spain over to his son Philip II and the imperial crown (1556) to his brother Ferdinand, and retired to a monastery in Spain.

Charles II (1661–1700), reigned 1665–1700. The last Habsburg to be king of Spain, he inherited a kingdom already in a decline which he was unable to halt. Childless, he chose Philip of Anjou, grandson of Louis XIV of France, as his successor; this ultimately gave rise to the War of the Spanish Succession.

Charles IV (1748–1819), reigned 1788–1808. He was dominated by his wife Maria Luisa and her lover Manuel de Godoy (Prime Minister from 1792). During the Napoleonic Wars he suffered the loss of the Spanish fleet, destroyed along with that of France at Trafalgar in 1805. Following the French invasion of Spain in 1807, Charles was forced to abdicate. He died in exile in Rome.

Charles^3 /tʃɑːlz/ the name of seven Holy Roman emperors, notably:

Charles V Charles I of Spain (see CHARLES^2).

Charles VI (1685–1740), Holy Roman emperor, reigned 1711–40. His claim to the Spanish throne instigated the War of the Spanish Succession, but he was ultimately unsuccessful. He became emperor on the death of his elder brother; with no surviving male heirs, he drafted the Pragmatic Sanction in an attempt to ensure that his daughter Maria Theresa succeeded to the Habsburg dominions. The failure for this to be accepted by the whole of Europe triggered a struggle for power on Charles's death and the War of the Austrian Succession.

Charles VII /tʃɑːlz, French ʃarl/ (1403–61), king of France 1422–61. At the time of his accession to the throne, much of northern France was under English occupation, including Reims, where he should have been crowned. After the intervention of Joan of Arc, however, the French experienced a dramatic military revival. Charles was crowned at Reims, and his reign eventually saw the defeat of the English and the end of the Hundred Years War. He modernized the administration of the army and did much to lay the foundations of French power in the following decades.

Charles XII /tʃoːlz/ (also Karl XII /koːl/) (1682–1718), king of Sweden 1697–1718. Three years after his succession, he embarked on the Great Northern War against the encircling powers of Denmark, Poland-Saxony, and Russia. In the early years he won a series of victories, but in 1709 he embarked on an expedition deep into Russia which ended in the destruction of his army at Poltava and the internment of Charles until 1715. He resumed his military career after his return but was killed while besieging a fortress in Norway.

Charles, Prince /'tʃoːlz/, Charles Philip Arthur George, Prince of Wales (b.1948), heir apparent to Elizabeth II. Educated at Gordonstoun School in Scotland and Trinity College, Cambridge, he was invested as Prince of Wales in 1969. He served in the Royal Navy 1971–6, and married Lady Diana Spencer (see DIANA, PRINCESS) in 1981; the couple publicly announced their separation in 1993 and divorced in 1996. They had two children, Prince William Arthur Philip Louis (b.1982) and Prince Henry Charles Albert David (b.1984).

Charles Martel /moː'tel/ (*c.*688–741), Frankish ruler of the eastern part of the Frankish kingdom from 715 and the whole kingdom from 719. He earned his nickname Martel ('the hammer') from his victory at Poitiers in 732, which effectively checked the Muslim advance into Europe. His rule marked the beginning of Carolingian power; Charlemagne was his grandson.

Chaucer /'tʃɔːsə(r)/, Geoffrey (*c.*1342–1400), English poet. Born in London, he served at court and in a number of official posts before going on a series of diplomatic missions to Spain, Italy, France, and Flanders in the 1370s. From the late 1380s, particularly with the death of his wife in 1387, he suffered a number of periods of misfortune and financial insecurity. His early work (including The Book of the Duchess, 1369) shows the influence of French literature; he also translated part of the Roman de la rose during this period. During the middle period of his career, in which he wrote the long narrative poem Troilus and Criseyde (1385) and The Parlement of Fowles, his work was particularly influenced by Italian poets of his day, such as Petrarch and Boccaccio. It was not until the later part of his life that he wrote his most famous work, the Canterbury Tales (*c.*1387–1400), a cycle of linked tales told by a group of pilgrims who meet in a London tavern before their pilgrimage to the shrine of St Thomas à Becket in Canterbury. In this work in particular Chaucer demonstrated skills of characterization, humour, versatility, and a distinctive narrative style that established him as the traditional starting-point for English literature and as the first great English poet; in addition Chaucer's vernacular work helped to establish the East Midland dialect of English of his day as the standard literary language.

Chekhov /ˈtʃekɒf/, Anton (Pavlovich) (1860–1904), Russian dramatist and short-story writer. Chekhov studied medicine in Moscow, and combined his medical practice with writing short humorous stories for journals. He is best known as the author of such plays as The Seagull (1895), Uncle Vanya (1900), The Three Sisters (1901), and The Cherry Orchard (1904). First produced at the Moscow Art Theatre under Konstantin Stanislavsky, they established the theatre's reputation and style. Chekhov's work portrays upper-class life in pre-revolutionary Russia with a blend of naturalism and symbolism and almost imperceptible shifts from comedy to tragedy. He had a considerable influence on 20th-century drama; George Bernard Shaw paid tribute to him in Heartbreak House (1919). □ Chekhovian /tʃeˈkəʊvɪən/ adj.

China /'tʃaɪnə/ (official name People's Republic of China) a country in eastern Asia, the third largest and most populous in the world; pop. (est. 1991) 1,151,200,000; language, Chinese (of which Mandarin is the official form); capital, Beijing. Chinese civilization stretches back until at least the 3rd millennium BC, the country being ruled by a series of dynasties, until the Qing (or Manchu) dynasty was overthrown by Sun Yat-sen in 1911, China being proclaimed a republic the following year. The country was stricken by civil war (1927–37 and 1946–9) and by Japanese invasion, and soon after the Second World War the corrupt and ineffective Kuomintang government of Chiang Kai-shek was overthrown by the Communists, the People's Republic of China being declared in 1949. The Communists have remained in power, and in June 1989 a pro-democracy movement was ruthlessly repressed. For many centuries China remained closed to Western economic or political penetration, both under its old imperial rulers and its new Communist ones. However, since the late 1970s foreign investment in China has been permitted, and in 1997 many state-owned firms were privatized. By 2000 China's economy was the second largest in the world (after the US). (See also TAIWAN.)

▪ Chinese is a member of the Sino-Tibetan language group and is an isolating tonal language with no inflections, declensions, or conjugations. It is the world's most commonly spoken first language, with an estimated one billion speakers in China and elsewhere. Of the many dialects, the Mandarin group and Cantonese are the most widespread, and a form of Mandarin is used as the official language of China. Chinese script is logographic: many of the characters were in origin pictographs, with each sign standing for an object, but they gradually developed into a system of non-pictorial ideographs which can also represent both abstract concepts and the sounds of syllables. Despite its complexity, the script has advantages; for example, it makes written communication possible between people speaking mutually incomprehensible dialects. Examples of Chinese writing date back well beyond 1000 BC. Traditionally Chinese books were arranged in vertical columns and read from right to left, but now they are usually composed horizontally from left to right. Until the beginning of the 20th century most written Chinese was in a style imitative of the Chinese classics (largely written before 200 BC), but a reform movement was started to make the literature available to the masses, and many simplified characters were introduced. Since 1958 the Pinyin system of spelling, using the Roman alphabet, has been adopted for educational and international use.

Chomsky /ˈtʃomskɪ/, (Avram) Noam (b.1928), American theoretical linguist and political activist. His theory of transformational grammar is set out in Syntactic Structures (1957). Language is seen as a formal system possessing an underlying 'deep structure', from which the 'surface structure' is derived by a series of transformations. A grammar is seen as a set of rules capable of generating all and only the grammatical sentences of a language when applied to the lexicon of that language. A distinction is made between a speaker's linguistic competence, which is idealized, and actual performance; the theory sets out to account only for the former. Chomsky has revised the theory since 1957, most notably in Lectures on Government and Binding (1981). In addition, Chomsky was a leading opponent of the American involvement in the Vietnam War, and later also voiced his doubts about the American role in the Gulf War of 1991.

Chopin /ˈʃəʊpæn/, Frédéric (François) (Polish name Fryderyk Franciszek Szopen) (1810–49), Polish-born French composer and pianist. A concert pianist from the age of 8, he wrote almost exclusively for the piano. Inspired by Polish folk music, his mazurkas (fifty-five in all) and polonaises (some thirteen) were to become his trademarks. He is also noted for short piano pieces full of poetic intensity; good examples are his nineteen nocturnes and twenty-four preludes. As well as writing for solo piano, he wrote two piano concertos (1829; 1830). For some years Chopin was the lover of the French writer George Sand, but their affair ended two years before his death from tuberculosis.

▪ Christianity is today the world's most widespread religion, with more than a billion members. It is divided into many denominations and sects, the main divisions being the Roman Catholic, Protestant, and Eastern Orthodox Churches. Christians in general believe in one God in three Persons (the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit) and that Jesus is the son of God who rose from the dead after being crucified; a Christian hopes to attain eternal life through faith in Jesus Christ and should try to live by his teachings. At first Christians were members of a Jewish sect who believed that Jesus of Nazareth was the Messiah (or 'Christ', = anointed one). Largely owing to the missionary efforts of the Apostle St Paul, it quickly became an independent, mainly Gentile, organization. In the early centuries Christians experienced intermittent persecution in the Roman Empire, though there was no clear legal basis for this until the reign of the Emperor Decius (AO 250). By the 3rd century Christianity was widespread throughout the Roman Empire; in 313 Constantine ended persecution and in 380 Theodosius I recognized it as the state religion. There were frequent disputes between Christians, mainly over the status of Christ and the nature of the Trinity, and later over Church organization. Division between East and West, in origin largely cultural and linguistic, intensified, culminating in the Great Schism of 1054. In the West the organization of the Church, focused on the Roman papacy, was fragmented by the Reformation of the 16th century, which gave rise to the Protestant Churches. In more recent years the ecumenical movement has sought to reconcile these ancient divisions.

Christian Science n. the doctrine of the Church of Christ, Scientist, a Christian sect founded in Boston in 1879 by Mary Baker Eddy. Members believe that God and the mind are the only ultimate reality, and that matter and evil have no existence; illness and sin, they believe, are illusions that can be overcome by prayer and faith. As a consequence they generally refuse medical treatment. The movement has flourished in America and spread to many other countries; it has its own daily newspaper, The Christian Science Monitor. □ Christian Scientist n.

Christie^{1} /ˈkrɪstɪ/, Dame Agatha (1890–1976), English writer of detective fiction. Many of her novels feature the Belgian Hercule Poirot or the resourceful Miss Marple, her two most famous and successful creations. Among her best-known detective stories are Murder on the Orient Express (1934) and Death on the Nile (1937). Her novels are characterized by brisk, humorous dialogue and ingenious plots. She also wrote plays; The Mousetrap (1952) has had a record run of more than forty years on the London stage.

Christie^{2} /ˈkrɪstɪ/, Linford (b.1960), Jamaican-born British sprinter. Having won Olympic silver medals in the 100 metres and 4 × 100 metres relay events in 1988, Christie took the individual 100-metre title in 1992. This was followed by the world championship title at this distance in 1993, and in 1994 he took the European 100-metre championship title for the third consecutive time.

Christmas /ˈkrɪsməs/ n. & int. ● n. (pl. Christmases) 1 (also Christmas Day) the annual festival of Christ's birth, celebrated by most Christian Churches on 25 Dec. and marked especially by present-giving, family reunion, and eating and drinking. (See note below.) 2 the season in which this occurs; the time immediately before and after 25 Dec. ● int. sl. expressing surprise, dismay, etc. □ Christmas box a present or gratuity given at Christmas esp. to tradesmen and employees. Christmas cake Brit. a rich fruit cake usu. covered with marzipan and icing and eaten at Christmas. Christmas card a card sent with greetings at Christmas. The Christmas card as we know it dates from the mid-19th century. Christmas Eve the day or the evening before Christmas Day. Christmas pudding Brit. a rich boiled pudding eaten at Christmas, made with flour, suet, dried fruit, etc. Christmas rose a white-flowered winter-blooming evergreen hellebore, Helleborus niger. [OE Crīstes mæsse (MASS^{2})]

▪ The festival of Christ's birth has been celebrated in the Western Church on 25 December from about the end of the 4th century; in the East it was originally held on 6 January in conjunction with the Epiphany. There is no biblical or other direct evidence of the season of Christ's birth, and the date of Christmas may have been chosen to facilitate the conversion of followers of older religions, many of which held festivals around this time. Many of the customs now associated with Christmas were taken over from the Roman Saturnalia and from pre-Christian festivals celebrating the winter solstice (21 December).

Christmas Island 1 an island in the Indian Ocean 350 km (200 miles) south of Java, administered as an external territory of Australia since 1958; pop. (1991) 1,275. 2 the former name (until 1981) for KIRITIMATI.

chromosome /ˈkrəʊməˌsəʊm/ n. Biol. a rodlike or threadlike structure found in the nuclei of most cells and carrying the genetic information in the form of genes. Chromosomes, only found in eukaryotic cells, can normally be seen as separate structures only when the cell is dividing. A normal undivided chromosome contains a single DNA double helix (associated with protein) in which the genes are arranged in linear order. The number of chromosomes per cell varies between species. Humans have twenty-three pairs of which one pair determines the sex of the individual: a female carries two similar X chromosomes in each cell while a male has one X and one smaller Y chromosome. (See also DNA.) □ chromosome map a plan showing the relative positions of genes along the length of a chromosome. □ chromosomal /ˌkrəʊməˈsəʊm(ə)l/ adj. [G Chromosom (as CHROMO-^{2}, -SOME^3)] chromosphere /ˈkrəʊməˌsfɪə(r)/ n. Astron. the region immediately above the photosphere of the sun which, together with the corona, constitutes its outer atmosphere. Material in this region is at temperatures of 10,000–20,000°C, and is subject to magnetic forces that may occasionally propel it outwards for thousands of kilometres as solar flares. □ chromospheric /ˌkrəʊməˈsferɪk/ adj. [CHROMO-^{2} + SPHERE] chronometer /krəˈnomɪtə(r)/ n. a time-measuring instrument, esp. one keeping accurate time in spite of movement or variations in temperature, humidity, and air pressure. The main stimulus to the development of chronometers was the need for an accurate method of determining longitude at sea. Longitude is calculated by comparing local time with Greenwich Mean Time; the former can be found by astronomical observation, but without an accurate timekeeper it is not easy to ascertain Greenwich time. By 1785 French and English clockmakers had evolved a chronometer accurate to better than one second a day, employing special balance-wheels and springs. Modern chronometers use a quartz crystal kept in oscillation at a constant frequency by electronic means. The advent of radio time signals did away with the need for expensive marine chronometers.

Churchill^{1} /'tʃɜ:tʃɪl/, Caryl (b.1938), English dramatist. She is best known for the satire Serious Money (1986); written in rhyming couplets, it deals with 1980s speculators and the ethics of high finance. Her other plays include Top Girls (1982) and Mad Forest (1990).

Churchill^{2} /'tʃɜ:tʃɪl/, Sir Winston (Leonard Spencer) (1874–1965), British Conservative statesman, Prime Minister 1940–5 and 1951–5. He served as Home Secretary (1910–11) under the Liberals and First Lord of the Admiralty (1911–15), but lost this post after the unsuccessful Allied attack on the Turks in the Dardanelles. He was only to regain it in 1939 under Neville Chamberlain, whom he replaced as Prime Minister in May 1940. Serving as war leader of a coalition government until 1945, Churchill demonstrated rare qualities of leadership and outstanding gifts as an orator. Part of his contribution to victory was to forge and maintain the Alliance, especially with the US, which defeated the Axis Powers. After the victory he was defeated in the general election of 1945; elected Prime Minister for a second term in 1951, he retired from the premiership in 1955, but remained an MP until 1964. His writings include The Second World War (1948–53) and A History of the English-Speaking Peoples (1956–8); he was awarded the Nobel Prize for literature in 1953.

churchman /'tʃɜ:tʃmən/ n. (pl. -men) 1 a member of the clergy or of a church. 2 a supporter of the church.

Church of England the English branch of the Western Christian Church, which rejects the pope's authority and has the monarch as its titular head and nominator of its bishops and archbishops. A synod held at Whitby in 664 resolved the earlier conflict between the indigenous Celtic Church, dominated by missionaries from Ireland and Scotland, and the Roman customs, introduced by St Augustine's mission (597), in favour of the latter. The English Church remained part of the Western Catholic Church until the Reformation of the 16th century: against a background of religious dissatisfaction, growing national self-awareness, and Continental Protestantism, Henry VIII failed to obtain a divorce from Catherine of Aragon and subsequently repudiated papal supremacy, bringing the English Church under the control of the Crown. The Church achieved its definitive form under Elizabeth I, when the Book of Common Prayer became its service-book and the Thirty-nine Articles its statement of doctrine. A chief aim of the Church of England has been, while rejecting the claims of Rome, to maintain its continuity with earlier tradition.

Church of Scotland the national (Presbyterian) Christian Church in Scotland. At the Reformation the Calvinist party in Scotland, under John Knox, reformed the established Church and organized it on Presbyterian lines (1560). During the next century there were repeated attempts by the Stuart monarchs to impose episcopalianism, and the Church of Scotland was not finally established as Presbyterian until 1690. Like many Protestant Churches it has had a complicated history of schism and reunification.

Church Slavonic n. (also Old Slavonic or Old Church Slavonic) the earliest written Slavonic language, surviving as a liturgical language in the Orthodox Church. It was originally a South Slavonic dialect from the region of Macedonia, used in the 9th century by St Cyril and his brother St Methodius for their missionary purposes in the Slav countries of Moravia and Pannonia. Throughout the Middle Ages it was the language of culture for many Orthodox peoples of eastern Europe, playing a role similar to that of Latin in the West. Two different alphabets were used, Glagolitic and Cyrillic.

Churchward /'tʃɜ:tʃwəd/, George Jackson (1857–1933), English railway engineer. He spent most of his working life at the Swindon works of the Great Western Railway, rising to take effective control of rolling stock from 1899 to 1921. Churchward made Swindon the most modern locomotive works in the country, and is particularly remembered for the standard four-cylinder 4–6–0 locomotives that he introduced in 1903–11. These formed the basis of many subsequent designs. Churchward also became the first mayor of Swindon; he was killed while crossing a railway line.

▪ Photographic motion pictures projected on to a screen became available to the general public from about 1895, in the form of short silent comedies, dramas, or documentaries shown either as sideshows at fairgrounds or as items in music-hall programmes. From 1900 to 1914 the film industry was international, led by France, Italy, Britain, and the US, and films increased in length from a few minutes to two hours. During the First World War the demand for films grew at a time when European producers were least able to meet it. The American industry took advantage of this and the US became the foremost film-making country, Hollywood in California being the chief centre of production. In the 1920s the US consolidated this position, developing the star-system and film publicity simultaneously, and the cinema became the people's entertainment. Sound films evolved in the late 1920s and (because of the language barrier) forced national film industries to develop independently. In 1932 a three-colour process known as Technicolor was developed. After the Second World War the increasing popularity of television seriously threatened the prosperity of the film industry, which fought back with the introduction of new techniques, such as wide screens and stereo sound, and ever more expensive and technologically sophisticated productions. The growth in the 1970s of the video industry, rather than killing off cinema as predicted by many, appears to have had the opposite effect of stimulating greater interest in films.

CinemaScope /ˈsɪnɪməˌskəʊp/ n. propr. a cinematographic process in which special lenses are used to compress a wide image into a standard frame and then expand it again during projection. [L, = ring]

- The modern circus dates from the late 18th century, when horse-riding displays were given in London in an arena that also had a stage for singing, dancing, and pantomime. This form of entertainment spread to other parts of Britain, and to Europe, Russia, and the US, some permanent shows being mounted and others travelling around in caravans and wagons (later by train). From the early 19th century they were often combined with the travelling menageries and wild animal performances that had become very popular. In the second half of the 19th century acts involving acrobatics became popular after the invention of the flying trapeze by Jules Léotard (1830–70) and the spectacular tightrope walk across Niagara Falls by Charles Blondin in 1859. In Europe circuses were generally restricted to a single ring, while in the US circuses became bigger and more spectacular, often with three rings, the best-known being the Barnum and Bailey circus, which started in 1881. After losing its popularity in Britain in the early 20th century, the circus enjoyed something of a revival through large and elaborate productions such as those of Sir C. B. Cochran and Bertram Mills (1873–1938), but traditional circuses are now less common in Britain and their use of animals has led to protests by animal rights activists and bans by some local authorities. In Russia and China, however, the circus has continued to flourish.

classical music n. serious or conventional music following long-established principles rather than a folk, jazz, or popular tradition. It is associated with acoustic instruments, in particular the orchestra, and the sonata form; however, modern experimental composers such as Karlheinz Stockhausen and John Cage, using electronic instruments and other devices, are generally considered to be working within classical music. The term is used more specifically with reference to music written *c.*1750–1800, as opposed to baroque and romantic music, and is exemplified by the work of Haydn, Mozart, and the young Beethoven. During this period the orchestra, the chamber group, and the various compositional forms such as symphony, concerto, and sonata became standardized.

classicism /'klæsɪˌsɪz(ə)m/ n. 1 (also Classicism) the following of a classic style. (See note below.) 2 a a classical scholarship. b the advocacy of a classical education. 3 an ancient Greek or Latin idiom. □ classicist n.

- In the arts, classicism denotes a style modelled on the qualities traditionally associated with the art of ancient Greece and Rome, for example harmony, restraint, and adherence to recognized standards of form and craftsmanship. The term is frequently opposed to romanticism. The painters and sculptors of Renaissance Italy such as Michelangelo and Raphael exemplify classicism, as does the 16th-century architect Palladio. In France, classicists included the painter Nicholas Poussin and the dramatists Racine and Corneille; in England the style was favoured by the Augustan poets John Dryden and Alexander Pope. The classicism of the later 18th century is frequently referred to as neoclassicism.

Claude Lorraine /ˌklɔːd ləˈreɪn/ (also Lorrain) (born Claude Gellée) (1600–82), French painter. By 1630 he had achieved great fame in Italy, where he served his apprenticeship as a landscape painter. His paintings were so much in demand that he recorded them in the form of sketches in his Liber Veritatis (c.1635) to guard against forgeries. Although the influence of the late mannerists is evident in his early landscapes, his mature works concentrate on the poetic power of light and atmosphere. He was particularly admired in England, where he inspired the painters J. M. W. Turner and Richard Wilson (1714–82).

Claudius /ˈklɔːdɪəs/ (full name Tiberius Claudius Drusus Nero Germanicus) (10 BC–AD 54), Roman emperor 41–54. He spent his early life engaged in historical study, prevented from entering public life by his physical infirmity; he was proclaimed emperor after the murder of Caligula. His reign was noted for its restoration of order after Caligula's decadence and for its expansion of the Roman Empire, in particular his invasion of Britain in the year 43, in which he personally took part. His fourth wife, Agrippina (AD 15–59), is said to have killed him with a dish of poisoned mushrooms.

A Chief of Staff in the Prussian army (1815) and later a general (1818), he went on to write the detailed study On War (1833), which had a marked influence on strategic studies in the 19th and 20th centuries.

Clausius /ˈklaʊzɪəs/, Rudolf (1822–88), German physicist, one of the founders of modern thermodynamics. He was the first, in 1850, to formulate the second law of thermodynamics, thereby reconciling apparent conflicts between the work of Nicolas Carnot and James Joule. He later developed the concept of (and coined the term) entropy, which was his greatest contribution to physics. Clausius also carried out pioneering work on the kinetic theory of gases, in which he introduced the idea of the mean path length and effective radius of a moving molecule.

Cleopatra /klɪəˈpætrə/ (also Cleopatra VII) (69–30 BC), queen of Egypt 47–30. The last Ptolemaic ruler, she was restored to the throne by Julius Caesar, having been ousted by the guardians of her father Ptolemy Auletes (d.51). After her brief liaison with Caesar she forged a longer political and romantic alliance with Mark Antony, by whom she had three children. Their ambitions for the expansion of the Egyptian empire ultimately brought them into conflict with Rome, and she and Antony were defeated by Octavian at the battle of Actium in 31. She is reputed to have committed suicide by allowing herself to be bitten by an asp.

- The term clipper was first applied to the speedy schooners built in Virginia and Maryland in the early 19th century; it is said to have arisen because such ships could 'clip' the passage-time of the regular packet ships. The hull design was long and low with a very sharply raked stem, and was later combined with the three-masted square rig, making the clippers of the mid-19th century among the finest productions of the age of sail. The first British clippers were built for the tea trade, a profitable cargo, with the first arrivals in London from China each year commanding the highest prices; the best known of the tea-clippers is the Cutty Sark, now preserved on the dockside at Greenwich in London. The opening of the Suez Canal in 1869 removed the need for fast ships that could travel round the Cape of Good Hope, and heralded the end of the clipper era.

Clive /klaɪv/, Robert, 1st Baron Clive of Plassey (known as Clive of India) (1725–74), British general and colonial administrator. In 1743 he joined the East India Company in Madras, becoming governor of Fort St David in 1755. Following the Black Hole of Calcutta incident, he commanded the forces that recaptured Calcutta from Siraj-ud-Dawlah (*c.*1729–57), nawab of Bengal in 1757. Clive's victory at Plassey later that year made him virtual ruler of Bengal, helping the British to gain an important foothold in India. After returning to Britain 1760–5, he served as governor of Bengal until 1767, restructuring the administration of the colony and restoring discipline to the East India Company, whose reputation had been called into question. Clive was subsequently implicated in the company's corruption scandals; although officially exonerated, he committed suicide.

- The first true mechanical clock dates from *c.*1280. Such clocks were large weight-driven structures fitted into towers; they had no dial or hands, but sounded a signal which alerted a keeper to toll a bell. In the 14th century public striking-clocks appeared, using a foliot or weighted arm as an oscillating flywheel controlled by a toothed wheel and an escapement mechanism. The first spring-driven clocks appeared *c.*1500, and led to the development of watches. The 17th century saw the introduction of the anchor escapement and the balance-wheel, followed by the balance-spring, whose frequency of oscillation was controlled by a spiral spring of the now familiar type. In 1657 Christiaan Huygens first used the swinging pendulum, a great advance because it is free from the friction of gears to which the foliot was subject. Electrically driven clocks were introduced by 1840, and the quartz clock in 1927–30, using a quartz crystal maintained in oscillation at a fixed high frequency. Most accurate of all is the caesium clock, depending on the vibration of atoms of caesium. (See also WATCH, WATER-CLOCK.)

▪ Coal is the most abundant form of solid fuel, formed from the remains of trees and other plant material, mostly during the Carboniferous period. Types of coal vary from black anthracite (almost pure carbon) through bituminous coal, which contains tarry substances (mostly hydrocarbons which form gases when heated), to lignite, a soft brown coal of later formation and with lower calorific value. Coal occurs in layers or seams typically a few metres thick. Layers near the surface are mined by opencast methods, removing and later replacing the covering soil; deeper layers are mined by sinking shafts and excavating the coal layers by human labour or, increasingly, by machine, leaving pillars to support the ground above. Coal is widely used as a fuel in industry for the production of heat and electric power, and for producing coke and (formerly) gas. The pre-eminent fuel of the Industrial Revolution, coal has lost much of its importance to oil and natural gas; however, these are limited in quantity, whereas coal deposits are sufficient for several hundred years.

cold fusion n. Physics nuclear fusion at room temperature, seen as a potential source of limitless pollution-free energy. In March 1989 it was announced by Stanley Pons of the US and Martin Fleischmann of Britain, and independently by Stephen E. Jones and colleagues in the US, that they had achieved cold fusion. They passed an electric current through a rod of palladium wrapped with platinum wire and placed in a tube of deuterium, claiming an output of four times more energy than they had put in, together with the production of neutrons and tritium. Although research into possible energy generation by methods like this continues, most scientists are sceptical of the claim that nuclear fusion is involved.

cold war n. a state of hostility between nations without actual fighting, consisting of threats, violent propaganda, subversive political activities, etc. The term is used specifically to refer to the hostility between the Soviet bloc countries and the Western powers which began after the Second World War with the Soviet takeover of the countries of eastern Europe. In 1949 NATO was formed, and was followed by the establishment of COMECON (also 1949) and later, the Warsaw Pact (1955). Over the following decades, the cold war spread to all parts of the world, with the development of the nuclear-arms race in the 1950s. After the resumption of START talks in 1985, agreement for limited arms control in 1987, and withdrawal of Soviet forces from Afghanistan in 1988–9, the cold war was formally and officially ended in November 1990 by a declaration of friendship and a treaty agreeing a great reduction of conventional armaments in Europe.

Colombia /kə'lombɪə/ a country in the extreme NW of South America, having a coastline on both the Atlantic and the Pacific Ocean; pop. (est. 1991) 32,873,000; official language, Spanish; capital, Bogotá. The Pacific coastal plain is humid and swampy, and most of the population is concentrated in the temperate valleys of the Andes. The economy is mainly agricultural, coffee being the chief export. Mineral resources are rich and include gold, silver, platinum (one of the world's richest deposits), emeralds, and salt, as well as oil, coal, and natural gas. Inhabited by the Chibcha and other native peoples, Colombia was conquered by the Spanish in the early 16th century, and under Spanish rule the capital Bogotá developed such a reputation for intellectual and social life as to be called 'the Athens of South America'. Like the rest of Spain's South American empire, Colombia achieved independence in the early 19th century, although the resulting Republic of Great Colombia lasted only until 1830, when first Venezuela and then Ecuador broke away to become independent states in their own right. The remaining state was known as New Granada, changing its name to Colombia in 1863. The country was stricken by civil war between 1949 and 1953, and since then has struggled with endemic poverty and social problems. It is notorious for its drugs traffic. □ Colombian adj. & n.

▪ Newton showed that white light can be split by a prism into its constituent colours, ranging from violet light, which has the highest frequency (shortest wavelength), to red light, which has the lowest frequency (longest wavelength). Colour perceived depends on the relative intensities of the mixture of frequencies present in the light received. Opaque objects appear coloured according to the wavelengths they reflect (other wavelengths being absorbed). Coloured lights can be mixed to produce other colours. Red, blue, and green lights – the primary colours – combine to produce white light, and in unequal combinations can produce almost any colour sensation. In the case of pigments or dyes the situation is different; combination is subtractive, and the colour of a mixture of two pigments depends on the wavelengths absorbed by neither. For pigments (as in printing, photography, etc.) magenta, yellow, and cyan are used as primary colours.

▪ Comedy tends to remain closer to everyday life than tragedy, with which it is often contrasted, and to explore everyday situations and common human failings rather than exalted acts and passions. Forms include romantic comedy, farce, slapstick, burlesque, and satire. The term was also applied in the Middle Ages to narrative poems with happy endings, such as Dante's Divine Comedy. Comedy in Europe dates back to ancient Athens, where the plays of Aristophanes (5th century BC) mix political and social satire with fantasy. Menander's New Comedy (4th century BC), in which young lovers undergo endless vicissitudes in the company of stock fictional characters, was developed in the Roman comedy of Plautus and Terence and eventually by Shakespeare. The great period of European comedy is often regarded as the 17th century, when Shakespeare and Ben Jonson were succeeded by Molière in France and by the Restoration comedy of such writers as William Congreve, Aphra Behn, and William Wycherley. 18th-century comedy is exemplified by Oliver Goldsmith and Richard Brinsley Sheridan, while Oscar Wilde and George Bernard Shaw typify the 19th century. In the 20th century absurdist writers such as Samuel Beckett and Eugène Ionesco and black humorists such as Joe Orton were influential; film and television performers included Charlie Chaplin, the Marx Brothers, and Woody Allen. In the 20th century the term also came to encompass the work of stand-up comics.

commedia dell'arte /kɒˌmeɪdɪə delˈɑːteɪ/ n. an improvised kind of popular comedy developed in 16th-century Italy and developed throughout Europe until the end of the 18th century. It featured stock character types (e.g. Harlequin, Columbine, Pantaloon), played by professional actors, who adapted their comic dialogue and action according to a few basic plots (commonly love intrigues) and to topical issues. It had an enormous influence on European drama, as seen in the work of Ben Jonson and Molière, and many of its characters continued into other theatrical forms, such as the harlequinade and the Punch and Judy show. ▪ Although it has taken different forms in different countries, the most familiar form of Communism is that established by the Bolsheviks after the Russian Revolution of 1917. It has generally been defined in terms of the system practised by the former USSR and its allies in eastern Europe, in China since 1949, and in certain developing countries such as Cuba, Vietnam, and North Korea. Perhaps the most important political force in the early and mid-20th centuries, Communism embraced a revolutionary ideology based on the overthrow of the capitalist system and, in theory at least, on the notion of constant progress towards the perfect stateless society. While Marx envisaged the state 'withering away' after takeover by the proletariat, the Communist countries of the 20th century, however, saw the state grow to control all aspects of society. The end of 1989 saw the collapse of bureaucratic Communism in eastern Europe against a background of its failure to meet people's economic expectations, a shift to more democracy in political life, under Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev, and growing nationalist aspirations in the Soviet republics, which led to the breakup of the USSR .

OF compas ult. f. L passus PACE^{1}]

▪ The simplest form of compass, the magnetic compass, depends on the property of a piece of magnetic material such as iron aligning itself in the north–south direction in the earth's magnetic field. Its use in navigation at sea was reported from China *c.*1100, western Europe 1187, Arabia *c.*1220, and Scandinavia *c.*1300, although it probably dates from much earlier. In simple compasses the compass card is fixed and a magnetic needle swings round above it; in all aircraft and ships' magnetic compasses, however, the card is fixed on top of the needle and swings round with it. In ships the compass casing is swung on gimbals so that it remains face upwards in spite of the rocking of the ship. The magnetic compass, which points to the magnetic north (whose position varies over the years), is subject to a number of errors (deviations can be caused by adjacent metal fitments etc.). Since the early 20th century the gyrocompass has become standard equipment for ships and aircraft, although a magnetic compass may be fitted as a stand-by.

- Calculating machines and other mechanical computing devices date from the 17th century and important early work was carried out, for example, by Charles Babbage and Ada Lovelace, but the electronic digital computer, one of the most revolutionary inventions of the 20th century, differs fundamentally from these earlier devices in its ability to carry out different tasks according to its programming, without any physical change. Computers are also much faster in operation and can handle data of greater quantity and complexity. Computers depend on the property of electronic switches to store information in binary form, the digits 0 and 1 being represented by the 'off' and 'on' positions. The first digital computers were developed in the US in the 1940s. In the rapid development of computers since then, several generations have been identified, distinguished by progressively reduced size and increased speed and capacity: the first generation, broadly in the period 1945–55, used vacuum tubes; in second-generation machines, roughly 1955–60, solid-state devices (transistors) replaced valves; the third generation, 1960–70, saw the introduction of integrated circuits and operating systems; the fourth generation, since 1970, employs large-scale integrated-circuit technology and very large rapid-access memory; fifth-generation computers are expected to begin to use artificial intelligence.

Comte /kɒmt/, Auguste (1798–1857), French philosopher, one of the founders of sociology. In his historical study of the progress of the human mind, he discerned three phases: the theological, the metaphysical, and the positive. He argued that only the last phase survives in mature sciences. Comte's positivist philosophy attempted to define the laws of social evolution and to found a genuine social science that could be used for social reconstruction. Major works include his Cours de philosophie positive (1830–42) and Système de politique positive (1851–4). (See also SOCIOLOGY, POSITIVISM.)

(see CONCERT): grosso big]

▪ The concerto for an individual player was developed by J. S. Bach in his harpsichord concertos from the concerti grossi of Corelli and his contemporaries. Handel's organ concertos were an important development, being among the first to provide a cadenza in which the soloist could display skill by extemporization. By this time the concerto had usually a three-movement form, and the classical composers continued this structure. Mozart composed nearly fifty concertos for various instrumental combinations, and established the modern style. Since the 19th century it has been usual for the composer to write out a cadenza.

▪ Concrete was used by the Romans as a building material, but its modern use dates from the 19th century with the development of Portland cement. Reinforced concrete, strengthened by embedded metal rods, bars, or mesh, was developed in France and England in the mid-19th century, and prestressed concrete was invented at the end of the century. In prestressed concrete the reinforcing metal bars are stretched while the concrete is wet and released when it has set round them, thereby compressing the concrete longitudinally and reducing its tendency to bend under a load; it has been used with notable success in the building of bridges.

Confucianism /kən'fjuːʃəˌnɪz(ə)m/ n. a system of philosophical and ethical teachings founded by Confucius in China in the 6th century BC and developed by Mencius in the 4th century BC, one of the two major Chinese ideologies (the other being Taoism). The basic concepts are ethical ones, for example love for one's fellows and filial piety, and the ideal of the superior man; traditional ideas such as yin and yang have also been incorporated into Confucianism. The publication in AD 1190 of the four great Confucian texts revitalized Confucianism throughout China; a second series of texts, the 'five classics', includes the I Ching. □ Confucian adj. & n. Confucianist n. & adj.

Confucius /kən'fjuːʃəs/ (Latinized name of K'ung Fu-tzu = 'Kong the master') (551–479 BC), Chinese philosopher. He spent much of his life as a moral teacher of a group of disciples, at first working for the government and later taking up the role of an itinerant sage. His ideas about the importance of practical moral values formed the basis of the philosophy of Confucianism. His teachings were collected by his pupils after his death in the Analects; later collections of Confucianist writings are probably only loosely based on his work.

Conrad /ˈkonræd/, Joseph (born Józef Teodor Konrad Korzeniowski) (1857–1924), Polish-born British novelist. Conrad's long career at sea (1874–94) inspired many of his most famous works, including his novel Lord Jim (1900). Much of Conrad's work, including his story Heart of Darkness (1902) and the novel Nostromo (1904), explores the darker side of human nature; however, the novel that initially brought him fame and success was Chance (1913), in which there is a romantic theme. Although French was his first foreign language, Conrad wrote in English and became a British citizen in 1886. His work had a significant influence on modernist fiction.

The movement has its origin in the ideas of a group of 19th-century Jewish intellectuals, in particular Zachariah Frankel (1801–75).

Conservative Party a political party disposed to maintain existing institutions and promote private enterprise. The modern Conservative Party in Britain (full name Conservative and Unionist Party) emerged from the old Tory Party under Peel in the 1830s and 1840s. Under Disraeli it was the party committed to traditional institutions, social reform, and the defence of the British Empire. After the First World War the Conservatives benefited from the decline of their traditional opponents, the Liberals, and dominated the political scene until defeated in the general election of 1945 by the Labour Party. During the postwar period the Conservatives were in power 1951–64, 1970–4, and from 1979. Under Margaret Thatcher and then John Major the party won an unprecedented four general elections and was able to enact a radical right-wing economic and social programme, including privatization of nationalized industries, reduction in direct taxation (but increased indirect taxation), dismantling of trade-union and wages policy legislation, deregulation of money markets, and reduction of local government control especially in health and education.

Constable /ˈkʌnstəb(ə)l/, John (1776–1837), English painter. Among his best-known works are early paintings like Flatford Mill (1817) and The Hay Wain (1821), both inspired by the landscape of his native Suffolk. By the late 1820s and early 1830s, Constable had become fascinated by the painting of changing weather patterns, and in works such as Sketch for 'Hadleigh Castle' (*c.*1828–9) and The Valley Farm (1835) he focused on the transient effects of clouds and light, so breaking new ground in landscape painting. He proved a great influence on French painters, especially Eugène Delacroix and the Barbizon School.

Constantine¹ /ˈkonstənˌtaɪn/ a city in NE Algeria; pop. (1989) 449,000. In ancient times it was the capital of the Roman province of Numidia. It was destroyed in 311 but rebuilt soon afterwards by Constantine the Great and given his name.

Constantine² /ˈkɒnstənˌtaɪn/ (known as Constantine the Great) (*c.*274–337), Roman emperor. The years from 305 until Constantine became sole emperor in 324 were marked by civil wars and continuing rivalry for the imperial throne. Constantine was the first Roman emperor to be converted to Christianity; he issued a decree of toleration towards Christians in the empire in 313. In 324 he made Christianity a state religion, although paganism was also tolerated. In 330 he moved his capital from Rome to Byzantium, renaming it Constantinopolis (Constantinople). His reign was marked by increasing imperial control of the Eastern Church and much church building, especially at the holy sites in Palestine. In the Orthodox Church he is venerated as a saint.

Constantinople /ˌkɒnstæntɪˈnəʊp(ə)l/ the former name for Istanbul from AD 330 (when it was given its name by Constantine the Great) to the capture of the city by the Turks in 1453. Constantinople is the anglicized form of Constantinopolis, 'city of Constantine'.

Constitution, the (in full Constitution of the USA) the basic written set of principles and precedents of federal government in the US. The Constitution, consisting of seven main articles, was drawn up in 1787, largely based on the earlier Articles of Confederation (1781–7); after ratification by the states of the Union, it came into operation in 1789. Since 1789 twenty-six amendments have been added, including, in particular, the Bill of Rights (1791), which contains the first ten amendments. The underlying principle and aim of the Constitution is the preservation of individual citizens' and states' rights while ensuring an effective federal government; the division into legislative (Congress), judicial (Supreme Court), and executive (President) arms of government was designed to limit overall federal powers.

Continental Army US hist. the army raised (with George Washington as commander) by the Continental Congress of 1775.

Continental Celtic see CELTIC.

Continental Congress US hist. each of the three congresses held by the American colonies in revolt against British rule in 1774, 1775, and 1776 respectively. The second Congress, convened in the wake of the battles at Lexington and Concord, created a Continental Army under George Washington, which fought and eventually won the American War of Independence.

Continental Divide (also called Great Divide) the main series of mountain ridges in North America, chiefly the crests of the Rocky Mountains, which form a watershed separating the rivers flowing eastwards into the Atlantic Ocean or the Gulf of Mexico from those flowing westwards into the Pacific.

continental drift n. the gradual movement of the continents across the earth's surface through geological time. The German meteorologist Alfred Wegener, beginning in 1910, was the first serious proponent of continental drift. Wegener's theory was based mainly on similarities in rock formations and in the flora and fauna of different continents, as well as the correspondence of coastlines, e.g. of South America and Africa, but his ideas made little headway, mainly because he could not suggest a plausible physical mechanism. In the 1960s information from the floors of the oceans, seismic studies, palaeomagnetic surveys, and radiometric dating of rocks confirmed the reality of continental drift, and led to the theory of plate tectonics. It is believed that the continental crust of the earth once formed a single supercontinent called Pangaea, which broke up to form Gondwana and Laurasia; these further split to form the present-day continents. The motive force is believed to come from convection currents in the earth's mantle, but this remains poorly understood. Modern satellite surveying techniques enable continental drift to be directly measured and motions of the order of a few centimetres per year are detected.

contraception /ˌkɒntrəˈsepʃ(ə)n/ n. the intentional prevention of conception and pregnancy; the use of contraceptive methods. Although some birth control methods date back to ancient times, the widespread practice of contraception is a modern phenomenon. The commonest barrier method is the condom or sheath, worn on the penis; rubber condoms are now mass-produced very cheaply, and are also used to protect against sexually transmitted diseases. Other barrier methods, used by women, include the diaphragm or cap, often used in conjunction with spermicidal agents; intrauterine devices, such as the coil, act by preventing the fertilized ovum from implanting in the uterus. Hormonal methods, introduced in the 1960s, use synthetic sex hormones which prevent ovulation. These are commonly taken as a daily pill, although longer-acting injections are also used.

Other forms of contraception include male and female sterilization, coitus interruptus, and abstinence from intercourse close to the time of ovulation (the rhythm method). Artificial contraception is contrary to the teaching of some religious groups, notably the Roman Catholic Church. [CONTRA- + CONCEPTION]

Copernicus /kə'pɜːnɪkəs/, Nicolaus (Latinized name of Mikołaj Kopernik) (1473–1543), Polish astronomer. Copernicus, canon of the cathedral at Frauenberg, first published his astronomical theories in outline in 1530, and more fully in De Revolutionibus Orbium Coelestium (1543). In order to avoid the complex system of epicycles required to explain planetary motions in Ptolemaic theory, he proposed a simpler model in which the planets orbited in perfect circles around the sun. His work ultimately led to the overthrow of the established geocentric cosmology.

[OE copor, coper, ult. f. L cyprium aes Cyprus metal, since the Roman supply of metal came almost entirely from Cyprus]

▪ A transition metal, copper is found in the native state as well as in the form of ores. It was the earliest metal to be used by humans, first by itself and then later alloyed with tin to form bronze. A ductile easily worked metal, it is a very good conductor of heat and electricity. Copper is a component of many alloys, but it is still used mainly in its pure state, especially for electrical wiring. Copper compounds are used in the production of green pigments, insecticides, and fungicides. The symbol Cu is from the Latin word for copper cuprum.

Coptic /ˈkoptɪk/ n. & adj. ● n. the language of the Copts. (See note below.) ● adj. of or relating to the Copts.

▪ Coptic represents the final stage of ancient Egyptian. It has an alphabet largely based on the Greek but with some letters borrowed from Egyptian demotic, and now survives only as the liturgical language of the Coptic Church. In the 3rd century AD Coptic was the prevailing language of Christian Egypt, but after the Arab conquest in 642 it began to give way to Arabic, dying out as a spoken language in the 17th century.

Coptic Church the native Christian Church in Egypt, traditionally founded by St Mark. It became isolated from much of the rest of the Christian world in 451 when it adhered to the Monophysite doctrine condemned by the Council of Chalcedon, and its numbers declined as the conquest of Egypt by Muslim Arabs in the 7th century was followed by centuries of persecution. Coptic Christians now make up about 5 per cent of Egypt's population.

copyright /ˈkɒpɪˌraɪt/ n., adj., & v. ● n. the exclusive legal right, given to the originator or his or her assignee for a fixed number of years, to print, publish, perform, film, or record literary, artistic, or musical material and to authorize others to do the same. (See note below.) ● adj. (of such material) protected by copyright. ● v.tr. secure copyright for (material).

▪ Protection of authors' rights was made necessary by the invention of printing (15th century). Rulers issued monopoly rights to individuals or guilds, and at first the only protection available to the author was against unauthorized publication; once published the use to which the material could be put was out of the author's control. The first English statute recognizing the author's rights was passed in 1710 and gave protection for twenty-eight years only; in 1790 a similar copyright law was passed in the US. In Britain, copyright now generally subsists for the author's lifetime plus fifty years; in the US protection lasts for twenty-eight years, renewable for a second twenty-eight-year term. Legislation has recently been introduced to protect rights in computer programs and computer-stored material. International copyright protection was recognized as a growing problem in the 19th century, and in 1886 fourteen countries adopted an international copyright agreement known as the Berne Convention. In 1955 this was supplemented by the Universal Copyright Convention, to which the United States and certain other countries were signatories.

▪ The corals constitute several orders of solitary and colonial anthozoan coelenterates. The order Alcyonaria contains the soft corals (e.g. dead man's fingers), while the order Gorgonacea contains the horny corals or gorgonians. The massive stony corals of the order Madreporaria secrete a calcareous skeleton, and because they contain symbiotic photosynthetic algae they inhabit shallow waters, where they tend to form reefs, atolls, and islands. They are therefore vitally important for the habitats they provide, and numerous fossil forms are known.

Corelli[1] /kə'relɪ/, Arcangelo (1653–1713), Italian violinist and composer. His best-known works are his trio and solo sonatas for the violin (1681; 1685; 1689; 1694; 1700), and his concerti grossi (published posthumously in 1714), especially the 'Christmas' concerto, with its pastorale on the Nativity. Corelli's innovative use of harmony and attention to melody had an important influence on composers abroad, particularly Purcell, J. S. Bach, and Handel.

Corelli[2] /kə'relɪ/, Marie (pseudonym of Mary Mackay) (1855–1924), English writer of romantic fiction. After the success of her first novel, A Romance of Two Worlds (1886), the sales of her novels Thelma (1887), Barabbas (1893), and The Sorrows of Satan (1895) broke all existing records for book sales. Her popular success was not matched by critical acclaim, however; although briefly championed by Oscar Wilde and William Gladstone, she had little enduring literary success.

Corn Laws a series of 19th-century laws introduced in an attempt to maintain the prosperity enjoyed by British agriculture during the Napoleonic Wars. The original Corn Law (1815) allowed foreign grain to be imported only after the price of home-grown wheat had risen above 80 shillings a quarter (= 8 bushels), but this had the unintended effect of forcing bread prices so high that both consumer and producer suffered. A sliding scale of import duties was introduced in 1828, but opposition to the Corn Laws continued to mount and they were eventually repealed by Robert Peel in 1846, an act which split the Conservative Party. (See also ANTI-CORN-LAW LEAGUE.)

Correggio /ko'redʒɪˌəʊ/, Antonio Allegri da (born Antonio Allegri) (*c.*1494–1534), Italian painter. He is best known for his series of frescos in Parma churches, especially S. Giovanni Evangelista (1520–3) and Parma cathedral (*c.*1526–30). His treatment of the cupolas shows the influence of Mantegna in its use of extreme foreshortening to give the illusion of great height. His devotional painting The Mystic Marriage of St Catherine (1520–6) and such mythological paintings as Jupiter and Io (*c.*1530) epitomize his soft and sensual style of painting, which influenced the rococo of the 18th century.

▪ Theories of the origin of the universe belonged essentially to the realms of mythology and religion until the 20th century, when observational evidence for processes of large-scale change in the universe became available: in particular, the recognition of the true nature of galaxies as external star systems like the Milky Way, and of the expansion of the visible universe. This led to the big bang theory which dominates modern cosmology, and which brings together observational astronomy and particle physics. The rival steady-state theory, which accommodated expansion within an unchanging infinite universe, has not been supported by recent discoveries.

(See note below.) 2 a member of a Cossack military unit. ● adj. of, relating to, or characteristic of the Cossacks. [F cosaque f. Russ. kazak f. Turkic, = vagabond]

▪ The Cossacks had their origins in the 15th century when refugees from religious persecution, outlaws, adventurers, and escaped serfs banded together in settled groups for mutual protection. In Imperial Russia the Cossacks were allowed considerable autonomy for their communities in return for service in protecting the frontiers; later they were organized into military units which were frequently used against insurrectionaries. After the Russian Revolution the Cossack communities lost their autonomy, although the military units were revived in the Second World War. With the collapse of Soviet rule Cossack groups have reasserted their identity in both Russia and Ukraine.

Counter-Reformation the reform of the Roman Catholic Church in Europe from the mid-16th to the mid-17th century. Though stimulated by Protestant opposition, reform movements within the Roman Catholic Church had begun almost simultaneously with the Reformation itself. Measures to oppose the spread of the Reformation were resolved on at the Council of Trent (1545–63). The Jesuit order became the spearhead of the movement, both within Europe and as a missionary force, while Spain, the strongest military power of the day, extended the Inquisition to countries under its influence. Although most of northern Europe remained Protestant, southern Germany and Poland were brought back to the Roman Catholic Church.

- The Cretaceous lasted from about 144 to 65 million years ago, between the Jurassic and Tertiary periods. The climate was warm and the sea level rose; the period is characterized especially in NW Europe by the deposition of chalk. The first flowering plants emerged and the domination of the dinosaurs continued, although they died out quite abruptly towards the end of it. A widespread layer of sediment dating from the Cretaceous–Tertiary (K/T) boundary has been shown since 1980 to be enriched in iridium and other elements and to contain minerals showing evidence of thermal shock and carbon deposits indicative of extensive fires. This appears to indicate the catastrophic impact of one or more large meteorites, and geologists have identified a formation at Chicxulub in the Yucatán Peninsula, Mexico, as a probable impact site. A resulting drastic climate change has been suggested as the cause of the extinction of dinosaurs and many other organisms at this time, but this remains controversial.

- Cricket was first played in England in Tudor times, and the laws were first drawn up in 1744. It has spread as a major sport in many of the territories formerly under British rule; full international or test matches are played between teams representing England, Australia, South Africa, the West Indies, New Zealand, India, Pakistan, Sri Lanka, and Zimbabwe. The object of the game is to score more runs than the opposition. Two members of the batting side are on the field at once, one or other of them defending his or her wicket against balls bowled (in sequences or overs of six) by a member of the fielding side and attempting to strike the ball out of reach of the fielders so as to score runs by running between the wickets before the ball is returned. A hit of the ball to the boundary scores four or six runs. Batsmen may be dismissed in several ways, of which the common ones are bowled, caught, run out, stumped, and leg before wicket (l.b.w.). The full game with two innings per side can last three, four, or five days, although shorter single-innings matches are usual at amateur level and have become popular at professional level since the 1960s.

Croatia /krəʊˈeɪʃə/ (Croatian Hrvatska /ˈhrvɑːtskə/) a country in SE Europe, formerly a constituent republic of Yugoslavia; pop. (est. 1991) 4,760,000; language, Croatian; capital, Zagreb. The interior of Croatia, which extends as far east as the Danube, is separated from a long Adriatic coastline by the Dinaric Alps. The Croats migrated to this area in the 6th–7th centuries, later forming a kingdom which was united with the Hungarian crown in 1102. Apart from a period of Turkish rule in the 16th–17th centuries, Croatia largely remained linked with Hungary until 1918, when it joined the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes (later Yugoslavia). After a period in the Second World War as a Nazi puppet state (1941–5), Croatia became part of Yugoslavia once more and remained a constituent republic until it declared itself independent in 1991. The secession of Croatia led to conflict between Croats and the Serb minority.

Croce /ˈkrəʊtʃeɪ/, Benedetto (1866–1952), Italian philosopher. The author of some seventy books, he founded and edited the influential review Critica (1903), in which he sought to revitalize Italian thought. In a series of works (1902–17) Croce presented his philosophical system ('Philosophy of the Spirit'), which is notable for its denial of the physical reality of a work of art and its identification of philosophical endeavour with a methodological approach to history. Croce served as Minister of Education 1920–1, but opposed Mussolini and all forms of totalitarianism; he returned to political life and helped to rebuild democracy in Italy after the fall of Mussolini.

Crompton^{2} /ˈkrɒmptən/, Samuel (1753–1827), English inventor. Famed for his invention of the spinning mule, he lacked the means to obtain a patent and sold his rights to a Bolton industrialist for £67. The House of Commons subsequently gave him £5,000 in compensation.

Cromwell^{1} /ˈkrɒmwel/, Oliver (1599–1658), English general and statesman. He was the driving force in the revolutionary opposition to Charles I in the English Civil War, and was the leader of the Parliamentary forces (or Roundheads), winning decisive battles at Marston Moor and Naseby. After helping to arrange the trial and execution of Charles I, he returned to military command to suppress resistance to the Commonwealth in Ireland and Scotland, finally defeating a Scottish army at Worcester (1651). He styled himself Lord Protector of the Commonwealth (1653–8); although he called and dissolved a succession of Parliaments, he refused Parliament's offer of the crown in 1657. His rule was notable for its puritan reforms in the Church of England and for the establishment of the Commonwealth as the major Protestant power in the world.

Cromwell^2 /'krɒmwel/, Thomas (*c.*1485–1540), English statesman, chief minister to Henry VIII 1531–40. After serving Cardinal Wolsey from 1514, he succeeded him as the king's chief adviser. He presided over the king's divorce from Catherine of Aragon (1533) and his break with the Roman Catholic Church, as well as the dissolution of the monasteries and a series of administrative measures, such as the Act of Supremacy (1534), designed to strengthen the Crown. He fell from favour over Henry's marriage to Anne of Cleves and was executed on a charge of treason.

▪ Crucifixion was a form of capital punishment used by various ancient peoples including the Persians, Carthaginians, and Romans; it was normally confined to slaves and other persons with no civil rights. The condemned person was first flogged and then made to carry a crosspiece to the place of execution, where a stake had been fixed in the ground. The prisoner was fastened to the beam by nails or cords, and the beam was drawn up and fixed to the stake so that the feet were clear of the ground; sometimes the feet were fastened to the upright. Death apparently resulted from exhaustion, perhaps caused by the difficulty of breathing when the body's weight is suspended by the arms in this way; it could be hastened by breaking the legs. The penalty was abolished in the Roman Empire by the emperor Constantine (337).

- The First Crusade (1096–9) resulted in the capture of Jerusalem and the establishment of Crusader states in the Holy Land, but the second (1147–9) failed to stop a Muslim resurgence, and Jerusalem fell to Saladin in 1187. The third (1189–92) recaptured some lost ground but not Jerusalem, while the fourth (1202–4) was diverted against the Byzantine Empire, which was fatally weakened by the resultant sack of Constantinople. The fifth (1217–21) was delayed in Egypt, where it accomplished nothing, and although the sixth (1228–9) resulted in the return of Jerusalem to Christian hands the city was lost to the Turks in 1244. The seventh (1248–54) ended in disaster in Egypt, while the eighth and last (1270–1) petered out when its leader, Louis IX of France, died on his way east. Although undertaken in a religious cause, the Crusades were carried on like most other medieval wars and were generally badly organized and indecisive.

Cuba /ˈkjuːbə/ a Caribbean country, the largest and furthest west of the islands of the West Indies, situated at the mouth of the Gulf of Mexico; pop. (est. 1990) 10,800,000; official language, Spanish; capital, Havana. The island was visited by Columbus in 1492, and colonized by Spain, the native inhabitants being virtually exterminated in the process. Cuba became nominally independent, although effectively under American control, after the Spanish-American War of 1898. Several periods of dictatorship followed the granting of full autonomy in 1934, and Cuba was taken over by a Communist revolution in 1959, although the US retained a naval base at Guantánamo Bay. Since then Cuba has been under the presidency of Fidel Castro. Having defeated an attempted invasion of US-backed Cuban exiles at the Bay of Pigs (1961), Castro's regime made advances in health care and education, but the country has suffered under a US trade embargo. Cuba was for many years heavily dependent on the USSR, and after the collapse of the Soviet Union and the Eastern bloc much of the country's trade was curtailed, with severe consequences for the economy.

cubism /ˈkjuːbɪz(ə)m/ n. an early 20th-century movement in art, esp. painting, in which perspective with a single viewpoint was abandoned and use was made of simple geometric shapes, interlocking planes, and, later, collage. (See note below.) □ cubist n. & adj. [F cubisme (as CUBE)]

- Cubism was a reaction against traditional modes of representation and perspective and impressionist concerns with light and colour. The style, created by Picasso and Braque and first named by the French critic Louis Vauxcelles in 1908, was inspired by the later work of Cézanne and by African sculpture. In its first phase, known as analytical cubism, the artists restricted their colour range and subject-matter and depicted objects as a series of planes, as they would be seen from a variety of different viewpoints. In the later phase, synthetic cubism (1912 onwards), they experimented with collages, sticking pieces of newspaper, matchboxes, etc., on to the canvas and combining them with drawing or painting. Other artists associated with cubism include Juan Gris (1887–1927) and Fernand Léger (1881–1955).

Curie /'kjʊərɪ/, Marie (1867–1934), Polish-born French physicist, and Pierre (1859–1906), French physicist, pioneers of radioactivity. Pierre's early researches were on piezoelectricity and on the effects of temperature on magnetism. The two scientists married in 1895. Working together on the mineral pitchblende, they discovered the elements polonium and radium, for which they shared the 1903 Nobel Prize for physics with A.-H. Becquerel. Marie succeeded to her husband's chair of physics at the Sorbonne after his accidental death, receiving another Nobel Prize (for chemistry) in 1911 for her isolation of radium. She also studied radioactive decay and the applications of radioactivity to medicine, pioneered mobile X-ray units, headed the French Radiological Service during the First World War, and afterwards worked in the new Radium Institute. She died of leukaemia, undoubtedly caused by prolonged exposure to radioactive materials.

Cyprus /'saɪprəs/ an island in the eastern Mediterranean about 80 km (50 miles) south of the Turkish coast; pop. (est. 1991) 708,000; official languages, Greek and Turkish; capital, Nicosia. The largest Mediterranean island, Cyprus was colonized from Greece in the 14th century BC, and in classical times was noted for copper (which is named after it) and the cult of Aphrodite. Placed at the crossroads of a number of ancient civilizations, Cyprus was successively subject to Assyrian, Egyptian, Persian, Ptolemaic, and Roman overlords; in medieval times it was ruled by Byzantines, Arabs, Franks, and Venetians, until it was conquered in 1571 by the Turks. In 1878 it was placed under British administration, becoming a Crown Colony in 1925. The island's recent history has been dominated by tension between the Greek Cypriots (some of whom favour enosis or union with Greece) and the Turkish Cypriots. After a period of virtual civil war, Cyprus became an independent Commonwealth republic in 1960. Tensions continued, and in 1974 Turkish forces intervened, taking over the northern part of the island. This became the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus in 1975, and proclaimed itself the independent Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus in 1983, but has not received international recognition.

[Pol. spelling of Bohemian Čech]

Czechoslovakia /ˌtʃekəslə'vækɪə/ a former country in central Europe in the period 1918–1992, now divided between the Czech Republic and Slovakia; capital, Prague. Czechoslovakia was created out of the northern part of the old Austro-Hungarian empire at the end of the First World War. It incorporated the Czech-speaking Bohemians and Moravians in the west with the Slovaks of Slovakia in the east. The country was crushed by Nazi Germany, which annexed the Sudetenland in 1938 and the rest of Bohemia and Moravia in 1939. After the Second World War, power was seized by the Communists and Czechoslovakia remained under Soviet domination, an attempt at liberalization being crushed by Soviet military intervention in 1968. Communist control collapsed in Dec. 1989, and democratic reforms were introduced. In Aug. 1990 the official name of the country was changed to the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic, and the two parts separated on 1 Jan. 1993. □ Czechoslovakian adj. & n. Czechoslovak /-'sləʊvæk/ n. & adj.

Dalai Lama /ˌdælaɪ ˈlɑːmə/ the spiritual head of Tibetan Buddhism and, until the establishment of Chinese Communist rule, the spiritual and temporal ruler of Tibet. The title is applied to a series of lamas, each of whom is believed to be the reincarnation of the bodhisattva Avalokitesvara. When the incumbent lama dies, the lamas search for a child who gives evidence that the soul of the deceased has entered into him; when found, the child succeeds to the office. The present Dalai Lama, the fourteenth incarnation, escaped to India in 1959 following the invasion of Tibet by the Chinese in the early 1950s; he was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in 1989. As Governor-General of India (1847–56) he was responsible for a series of reforms and innovations, notably the introduction of railways and telegraphic communications, as well as the drafting of legislation against slavery, suttee, and female infanticide. He considerably expanded British territory in India, taking Punjab and Pegu and annexing Oudh and Nagpur.

Dali /ˈdɑːlɪ/, Salvador (1904–89), Spanish painter. He joined the surrealists in 1928 and became one of the most prominent members of the movement. Like many surrealists, he was much influenced by Sigmund Freud's writings on dreams; many of his paintings portray subconscious or dream images painted with almost photographic realism against backgrounds of arid Catalan landscapes. Expelled from the surrealist group in 1938 because of his repudiation of its Marxist politics, he settled in the US; after becoming a Roman Catholic he devoted the latter part of his life to symbolic religious paintings. His most famous pictures include The Persistence of Memory (1931) and Christ of St John of the Cross (1951). He also produced surrealist writings and collaborated with Luis Buñuel in the production of Un chien andalou (1928) and other films.

Dalton /ˈdɔːlt(ə)n/, John (1766–1844), English chemist, the father of modern atomic theory. His study of gases led to his formulation of the law of partial pressures (Dalton's law), according to which the total pressure of a mixture of gases is equal to the sum of the pressures that each gas would exert separately. He then worked on the solubility of gases, producing fundamental work on atomic theory. He defined an atom as the smallest part of a substance that could participate in a chemical reaction, argued that elements are composed of atoms and that elements combine in definite proportions, and produced the first table of comparative atomic weights. He also gave the first detailed description of colour-blindness, based on his own inability to distinguish green from red.

[ME f. MLG, MDu.]

▪ Some of the earliest dams, dating from *c.*2500 BC, are to be found in Egypt, Iran, Iraq, and China, made of earth or masonry. Earth dams, with a waterproof core of clay to prevent seepage, are still found, although where site conditions are suitable concrete is now used. Gravity dams rely on the weight of the dam for stability; arch dams, with a curved structure having its convex face upstream, are supported by abutments at either side of the structure. The main uses of dams are to generate electricity by means of water turbines, to store water for irrigation and industrial or domestic water supply, and to supply canals with water. It is estimated that at present more than one-tenth of the stream-flow of the world's rivers is regulated by dams; by the year 2000 two-thirds could be regulated.

Dante /ˈdæntɪ/ (full name Dante Alighieri) (1265–1321), Italian poet. His early work consisted mainly of courtly love poetry; his first book, Vita nuova (*c.*1290–4), consists of thirty-one poems linked by a prose narrative and tells of his love for Beatrice Portinari (*c.*1265–90). However, Dante's international renown and reputation as the founding figure of Italian literature rests on The Divine Comedy (*c.*1309–20), an epic poem telling of his spiritual journey, in the form of an imagined visit to Hell and Purgatory with Virgil as guide and finally to Paradise with Beatrice, now a blessed spirit, as guide. Dante also wrote scholarly treatises on a number of subjects, including philosophy, science, and politics; his political activity led to his spending part of his life in exile from his native Florence. His innovative use of Italian did much to establish a vernacular literature; his Latin treatise De Vulgari Eloquentia (*c.*1303) promoted vernacular Italian as a literary language fit to replace Latin.

Gmc]

Dark Ages the period in the West between the fall of the Roman Empire and the high Middle Ages, *c.*500–1100, so called because it has been judged a time of relative unenlightenment and obscurity. Germanic tribes swept through Europe and North Africa, often attacking and destroying towns; some formed their own kingdoms, e.g. the Ostrogoths and Vandals in Italy, the Franks in France and western Germany, and the Angles and Saxons in England. The period was a time of political fragmentation with a lack of major cities and centres of learning, although the negative connotations of the term disguise some real achievements and imply an underestimation of classical influences on the newly settled Germanic peoples; the period saw the foundation of Christian monasteries, which kept scholarship alive, while learning was encouraged at the courts of Charlemagne and Alfred the Great.

The term has also been applied to a similar period in the history of Greece and the Aegean from the end of the Bronze Age until the beginning of the historical period, when the region seems to have been heavily depopulated, there was no building of palaces and fortresses, and the art of writing was apparently lost. However, the term glosses over some important factors, such as the growth of a strong oral tradition, which resulted in the emergence of the Homeric poems.

Dark Continent, the Africa, esp. in the time before it was fully explored by Europeans.

darts /dɑːts/ n.pl. (usu. treated as sing.) an indoor game in which darts are thrown at a circular target to score points. Darts is a predominantly British game; lightweight darts with a plastic or feather flight are thrown at a dartboard, which is marked with concentric circles and a bull's-eye in the centre and divided by radiating lines into numbered sectors. The game dates from the time of George III or earlier, although the present system of numbering the sectors was not introduced until 1896. It has long been associated with inns and public houses; recently, however, darts competitions have been televised.

Darwin^1 /ˈdɑːwɪn/ the capital of Northern Territory, Australia; pop. (1990) 73,300.

Darwin^2 /ˈdɑːwɪn/, Charles (Robert) (1809–82), English natural historian and geologist, proponent of the theory of evolution by natural selection. Grandson of the eminent physician and biologist Erasmus Darwin (1731–1802), he failed to complete his medical training and narrowly achieved a theological degree. Darwin took the post of unpaid naturalist on HMS Beagle for her voyage around the southern hemisphere (1831–6), during which he collected the material which became the basis for his ideas on natural selection. On his return he made his name as a geologist, in particular with his accounts of the formation of coral reefs and atolls. In 1858, he and A. R. Wallace agreed to publish simultaneously their similar thoughts on evolution, to the consternation of theologians. He went on to write an extensive series of books, monographs, and papers; On the Origin of Species (1859) and The Descent of Man (1871) changed our concepts of nature and of humanity's place within it.

David^{1} /ˈdeɪvɪd/ (died *c.*962 BC), king of Judah and Israel *c.*1000–*c.*962 BC. In the biblical account he was the youngest son of Jesse, and was made a military commander by Saul after slaying the Philistine Goliath. On Saul's death he became king of Judah and later of the whole of Israel, making Jerusalem his capital. He is traditionally regarded as the author of the Psalms, but it is unlikely that more than a fraction of the psalter is his work.

David^{2} /ˈdeɪvɪd/ the name of two kings of Scotland:

David I (*c.*1084–1153), sixth son of Malcolm III, reigned 1124–53. Much of his youth was spent at the English court, after his sister Matilda (1080–1118) married King Henry I of England in 1100. After succeeding his brother Alexander (*c.*1080–1124) as king of Scotland, David established a strong administration on the Norman model, bringing many retainers with him from England, encouraging the development of trade, and introducing legal reforms. In 1136, after Henry's death, David invaded England in support of his niece Matilda's claim to the throne, but was decisively defeated at the Battle of the Standard in Yorkshire in 1138.

David II (1324–71), son of Robert the Bruce, reigned 1329–71. His long reign witnessed a renewal of fighting between England and Scotland, with Edward III taking advantage of the Scottish king's minority to introduce Edward de Baliol (*c.*1283–1364) as an English puppet in his place. After returning from exile in France (1334–41), David was defeated by the English at Neville's Cross (1346) and spent eleven years in prison. His death without issue in 1371 left the throne to the Stuarts.

David^{3} /ˈdeɪvɪd/, Elizabeth (1913–92), British cookery writer. She played a leading role in introducing Mediterranean cuisine to Britain in the 1950s and 1960s. Her best-selling books include French Provincial Cooking (1960).

David^{4} /dæˈviːd/, Jacques-Louis (1748–1825), French painter. He is famous for neoclassical paintings such as The Oath of the Horatii (1784) and The Intervention of the Sabine Women (1799). He became actively involved in the French Revolution, voting for the death of Louis XVI and supporting Robespierre. Famous works of the revolutionary era include The Dead Marat (1793), which treats contemporary events with a grandeur hitherto reserved for history painting. Imprisoned after the fall of Robespierre, he returned to prominence under Napoleon.

David, St (also Dewi /ˈdewɪ/) (6th century), Welsh monk. Since the 12th century he has been regarded as the patron saint of Wales. Little is known of his life, but it is generally accepted that he transferred the centre of Welsh ecclesiastical administration from Caerleon to Mynyw, now St David's. He also established a number of monasteries in England and Wales and many churches in South Wales. Feast day, 1 Mar.

Davies^{1} /ˈdeɪvɪs/, Sir Peter Maxwell (b.1934), English composer and conductor. In 1967, with Harrison Birtwistle, he co-founded the Pierrot Players (later the Fires of London ensemble), for whom he composed many of his works. These include Taverner (1970) and Eight Songs for a Mad King (1969). Davies's work is influenced particularly by serialism and early English music.

Davies^{2} /ˈdeɪviːs/, (William) Robertson (1913–95), Canadian novelist, dramatist, and journalist. He won international recognition with his Deptford trilogy of novels. The first two of these, Fifth Business (1970) and The Manticore (1972), show the influence on Davies of Jungian psychology; the third novel, World of Wonders (1975), also explores psychological and spiritual issues.

Davies^{3} /ˈdeɪvɪs/, W(illiam) H(enry) (1871–1940), English poet. He emigrated to the US and lived as a vagrant and jobbing labourer there, writing The Autobiography of a Super-Tramp (1908) about his experiences. His poems often focus on the natural world; collections include The Soul's Destroyer and Other Poems (1905), which earned him the patronage of George Bernard Shaw.

da Vinci, Leonardo, see LEONARDO DA VINCI.

Davis^{1} /ˈdeɪvɪs/, Bette (born Ruth Elizabeth Davis) (1908–89), American actress. She established her Hollywood career playing a number of strong, independent female characters in such films as Dangerous (1935), Jezebel (1938), and All About Eve (1950). Her flair for suggesting the macabre and menacing emerged in later films, such as the melodrama Whatever Happened to Baby Jane? (1962) and the thriller Murder with Mirrors (1984).

Davis^{2} /'deɪvɪs/, Joe (1901–78) and Fred (1913–98), English billiards and snooker players. Joe Davis was the dominant figure in snooker for many years, holding the world championship from 1927 until his retirement in 1946. He was also world billiards champion (1928–32). His brother Fred Davis was world snooker champion (1948–9; 1951–6) and world billiards champion (1980).

Davis^{3} /'deɪvɪs/, Miles (Dewey) (1926–91), American jazz trumpeter, composer, and band-leader. In the 1950s he played and recorded arrangements by Gil Evans (1912–88) in a new style which became known as 'cool' jazz, heard on albums such as Kind of Blue (1959). For much of the time between 1955 and 1960 his quintet included John Coltrane. In the 1960s Davis pioneered the fusion of jazz and rock, on albums such as In a Silent Way (1969).

Davis^{4} /'deɪvɪs/, Steve (b.1957), English snooker player. He won a number of national and international events in the 1980s, becoming UK Professional Champion (1980–1; 1984–7) and World Professional Champion (1981; 1983–4; 1987–9).

Davis Cup an annual lawn tennis championship for men, first held in 1900, between teams from different countries. It was named after the American D. F. Davis (1879–1945), the doubles champion who donated the trophy.

Davisson /'deɪvɪs(ə)n/, Clinton Joseph (1881–1958), American physicist. Following work in support of a patent suit, and after a laboratory accident, he and L. H. Germer (1896–1971) discovered electron diffraction, thus confirming de Broglie's theory of the wave nature of electrons. He shared the Nobel Prize for physics for this in 1937, and later worked on the application of electron waves to crystal physics and electron microscopy.

Davis Strait a sea passage 645 km (400 miles) long separating Greenland from Baffin Island and connecting Baffin Bay with the Atlantic Ocean. The strait is named after the English explorer John Davis (1550–1605), who sailed through it in 1587.

Davy /'deɪvɪ/, Sir Humphry (1778–1829), English chemist, a pioneer of electrochemistry. After an apprenticeship with an apothecary-surgeon, he discovered nitrous oxide (laughing gas) and was invited to join the Royal Institution. Using electrolytic decomposition, he discovered the elements sodium, potassium, magnesium, calcium, strontium, and barium. Davy identified and named the element chlorine after he had demonstrated that oxygen was not a necessary constituent of acids, determined the properties of iodine, and demonstrated that diamond was a form of carbon. He appointed Faraday as his assistant.

Davy Jones n. Naut. sl. the evil spirit of the sea. □ Davy Jones's locker the bottom of the sea, esp. regarded as the grave of those who are drowned or buried at sea. [18th c.: orig. unkn.]

deconstruct /ˌdi:kən'strʌkt/ v.tr. subject to deconstruction. □ deconstructive adj. [back-form. f. DECONSTRUCTION]

deconstruction /ˌdi:kən'strʌkʃ(ə)n/ n. an approach to and method of critical analysis whose philosophy and practice attempts to challenge certain perceived assumptions of the Western philosophical tradition. Deconstruction was initiated by the French philosopher Jacques Derrida in the late 1960s and subsequently taken up by mainly US literary critics such as Paul de Man and J. Hillis Miller. Derrida claimed that Western philosophy had become rooted in a tradition which sought truth and certainty of meaning by privileging certain types of interpretation and repressing others; he emphasized, on the other hand, the instability and deferral of meaning in language and the limitlessness (or impossibility) of interpretation and coined his word différance in reference to this. Although deconstruction seemed to favour a challenge to traditional hierarchies and centres of power and thus has formed a strand in political movements such as feminism, its emphasis on the internal workings of language and texts and on the dissociation of text and external world has led to it being criticized for its insularity and lack of political engagement. □ deconstructionism n. deconstructionist adj. & n. [F déconstruction (as DE-, CONSTRUCTION)]

Dedekind /'deɪdəˌkɪnt/, Richard (1831–1916), German mathematician. One of the founders of abstract algebra and modern mathematics, Dedekind was professor at Brunswick from 1862 until his death. His analysis of the properties of real numbers solved the question of what numbers are, and supplied a satisfactory foundation on which analysis could be based. He is remembered also for his theory of rings of algebraic integers, which cast the theory of algebraic numbers into its general modern form. He introduced collections of numbers as entities of interest in their own right, whose relationships to each other may be studied by means of set theory.

Defoe /dɪˈfəʊ/, Daniel (1660–1731), English novelist and journalist. After a varied career of political journalism and secret service work, Defoe wrote Robinson Crusoe (1719) when he was nearly 60. Loosely based on the true story of the sailor Alexander Selkirk, it has a claim to being the first English novel. Its tale of the shipwrecked Crusoe battling for survival in virtual solitude is one of the most familiar and resonant myths of modern literature. Other major works include the novel Moll Flanders (1722) and the historical fiction A Journal of the Plague Year (1722).

De Forest /də ˈfɒrɪst/, Lee (1873–1961), American physicist and electrical engineer. His triode valve (patented in 1907) became the basic device for the large-scale amplification of signals, and was crucial to the development of radio communication, television, and computers. De Forest was one of the pioneers of radio broadcasting, successfully transmitting a live broadcast in 1910. He later developed a method of representing sound waves visually for recording and reproducing sound on cinema film.

deforest /diːˈfɒrɪst/ v.tr. clear of forests or trees.

deforestation /diːˌfɒrɪˈsteɪʃ(ə)n/ n. the deliberate destruction of natural forests. The felling and clearing of forests, mainly for agriculture and logging, has long been associated with human occupation in temperate regions, but accelerated rapidly in the late 20th century, especially in the tropics. The annual rate of destruction is estimated to be about 20 million hectares; over 50 per cent of the world's tropical forest has been destroyed in the last hundred years. Besides the loss of habitat and the threat to wildlife, deforestation often has other undesirable results such as soil erosion and disturbance to water supplies. Of most concern are effects on the atmosphere. Photosynthesis by forest trees is very important in removing carbon dioxide from the atmosphere, and deforestation therefore directly exacerbates the problem of global warming. Deforestation is part of the wider problem of the economic relationship between the developing countries and the developed world, and successful international action to control it has been limited.

de Gaulle /də ˈgəʊl/, Charles (André Joseph Marie) (1890–1970), French general and statesman, head of government 1944–6, President 1959–69. He served in the French army during the First World War, and during the Second World War was a member of the Cabinet at the time of France's surrender in June 1940. He escaped to Britain, where he was an instigator of the resistance and organized the Free French movement. Following the war he became interim President of the new French Republic, but later resigned. Having been asked to form a government, he became President in 1959 and went on to establish the presidency as a democratically elected office (1962). He resigned in 1969 after proposed constitutional changes were rejected by the electorate. In addition to extricating France from the Algerian crisis and strengthening the French economy, he is remembered for his assertive foreign policy (including withdrawing French forces from NATO and blocking Britain's entry to the EEC) and for quelling the student uprisings and strikes of May 1968.

de Klerk /də 'kleək/, F(rederik) W(illem) (b.1936), South African statesman, State President 1989–94. Becoming State President only months after assuming leadership of the National Party, he instigated the reforms which brought about the dismantling of apartheid in South Africa. After freeing Nelson Mandela and other ANC leaders in 1990 he lifted the ban on membership of the ANC and opened the negotiations with black political leaders that led to the country's first true democratic elections in 1994. After the ANC's electoral victory de Klerk was given a Cabinet post as a Deputy State President, but retired in 1997. In 1993 he shared the Nobel Peace Prize with Nelson Mandela.

de Kooning /də 'kuːnɪŋ/, Willem (1904–97), Dutch-born American painter. He and Jackson Pollock are generally regarded as the leading exponents of abstract expressionism. De Kooning's work in this genre from the late 1940s onwards usually retained figurative elements, whether represented or merely hinted at, as in Painting (1948). The female form became a central theme in his later work, notably in the Women series (1950–3).

Delaunay /də'lɔːneɪ/, Robert (1885–1941), French painter. For most of his career he experimented with the abstract qualities of colour, notably in his Eiffel Tower series (1910–12), and was one of the founder members of Orphism together with his wife, Sonia Delaunay-Terk. He was influenced by early cubism and painted some of the first purely abstract pictures, including his Formes circulaires cosmiques series.

Delaunay-Terk /dəˌlɔːneɪ'teək/, Sonia (1885–1979), Russian-born French painter and textile designer. She and her husband Robert Delaunay were among the founders of the movement of Orphism. She created abstract paintings based on harmonies of form and colour, her interest in the use of colour being reflected in her fabric and tapestry designs of the 1920s; her work in this field had a significant impact on international fashion.

della Quercia /ˌdelə ˈkwɜːʃə/, Jacopo (*c.*1374–1438), Italian sculptor. He is noted for his tomb of Ilaria del Carretto in Lucca cathedral (*c.*1406) and, above all, for the biblical reliefs on the portal of San Petronio in Bologna (1425–35), which are notable for the sense of depth they achieve. He became chief architect of the cathedral in his native Siena in 1435.

della Robbia /ˌdelə ˈrobɪə/, a family of Italian sculptors and ceramicists. Luca (1400–82) is the most famous, and is particularly well known for his relief panels in Florence cathedral. He invented vitreous glazes to colour terracotta figures, thus making it possible for polychromatic sculpture to be used in outdoor settings without suffering from the effects of damp. His nephew Andrea (1434–1525) carried on the family business of glazed terracotta production.

dendrochronology /ˌdendrəʊkrəˈnolədʒɪ/ n. a system of dating using the annual growth rings of trees to assign dates to timber; the study of these growth rings. Trees add a ring of growth each year, and variations in climate affect the width of the rings and give rise to recognizable sequences. By matching these from a tree of known date with those from an older tree overlapping in age, and combining a number of such overlaps, a master plot of tree-ring patterns can be built up covering several thousand years. Timber of unknown date from within the area of this plot can then be dated exactly by matching its rings, and this has also enabled radiocarbon dates to be more accurately calibrated. □ dendrochronologist n. dendrochronological /-ˌkronəˈlodʒɪk(ə)l/ adj. [Gk dendron tree + CHRONOLOGY]

Depression, the (also called the Great Depression) the severe economic depression of 1929–34. The Wall Street stock market crash of 1929 is often seen as its starting-point, although an earlier agricultural crisis caused by overproduction was also a factor. The sudden loss of confidence in the US and consequent withdrawal of funds resulted in widespread business failures and the calling in of loans made to Europe. A major Austrian bank collapsed, followed by others, and the Depression spread across Europe also. Unemployment reached 13.7 million in the US, 5.6 million in Germany, and 2.8 million in Britain. The most dramatic results of the Depression were the introduction of extensive state-controlled economic planning, such as the American New Deal, and the rise of right-wing movements such as the German Nazi Party.

Descartes /'deɪkɑːt/, René (1596–1650), French philosopher, mathematician, and man of science, often called the father of modern philosophy. Aiming to reach totally secure foundations for knowledge, he began by attacking all his beliefs with sceptical doubts. What was left was the certainty of his own conscious experience, and with it of his existence: 'Cogito, ergo sum' (I think, therefore I am). From this certainty he argued for the existence of God (as the first cause) and the reality of the physical world, and developed a dualistic theory of mind (conscious experience) and matter. His approach was of fundamental importance in the development of modern philosophy, particularly epistemology. In mathematics he developed the use of coordinates to locate a point in two or three dimensions: this enabled the techniques of algebra and calculus to be used to solve geometrical problems. Descartes suppressed his heretical doctrines of the earth's rotation and the infinity of the universe; fragments of his work in this field were published after his death. From 1628 to 1649 he lived in Holland, then departed for Sweden at the invitation of Queen Christina (1626–89). (See also CARTESIAN.)

De Stijl /də ˈstaɪl/ n. a 20th-century Dutch art movement which took its name from the periodical De Stijl ('Style') founded in 1917 by Theo van Doesburg (1883–1931) and Piet Mondrian. The adherents of the movement were concerned to find principles of equilibrium and harmony that would be applicable to life and society as well as art; the abstract, economical style is typified by the geometric simplicity of Mondrian's paintings and is closely related to neo-plasticism. Architects in the group included J. J. P. Oud (1890–1963) and Gerrit Rietveld (1888–1965). In the 1920s and 1930s De Stijl was influential on the Bauhaus and constructivist movements and on Purism.

detective story n. (also detective novel) a story etc. describing a crime (esp. a murder) and the detection of criminals. The first detective stories in English literature are generally reckoned to be Poe's 'The Murders in the Rue Morgue' (1841) and Wilkie Collins's The Moonstone (1868). Sir Arthur Conan Doyle's Sherlock Holmes stories achieved worldwide popularity in the late 19th century with the ideal of the gentleman detective; in the early 20th century British writers such as G. K. Chesterton, Agatha Christie, and Dorothy Sayers built on this tradition, emphasizing the triumph of law and order, often in genteel or aristocratic settings. This so-called golden age was challenged by the American hard-boiled detective writers such as Dashiell Hammett and Raymond Chandler from the 1930s onwards; their tough, realistic style reflects a world permeated by corruption and deceit. In more recent detective fiction, both classic and hard-boiled styles are well represented, testifying to the genre's popularity as well as its versatility.

developing country n. (also called less developed country) any of the poorer countries of the world, typically those that have not developed an industrial base. It is an imprecise term, applied to many countries in Africa and Latin America and to much of Asia; in 1988 the World Bank defined a developing country as one having a GNP per capita of less than US$6,000. Developing countries generally have a colonial past and now lag behind richer countries in terms of economic development, technology, infrastructure, and social and political institutions. However, the term is sometimes criticized as inadequate in that it classes together newly industrializing countries like South Korea and Singapore, which are becoming richer, with states such as Somalia and Bangladesh, which have stagnant or even falling incomes. Developing countries are sometimes known collectively as the Third World.

- The Devil (also called Satan or Lucifer) is the supreme spirit of evil in Jewish and Christian theology, enemy of God and tempter of humankind. In theological tradition he was regarded as the chief of the fallen angels, cast out of heaven for rebellion against God, but there was no fixed teaching on the exact nature of his sin; he was held to preside over those condemned to eternal fire (see HELL). In the narrative of the Fall, the serpent which tempted Eve has traditionally been regarded as his embodiment, and in Rev. 12:7–9 the Devil is identified with the dragon cast out by Michael and his angels. Popularly, the Devil is often represented as a man with horns, cloven hooves, and a forked tail.

diabetes /ˌdaɪəˈbiːtiːz/ n. a disease causing excessive thirst and the production of large amounts of urine. The commonest form of diabetes is known as diabetes mellitus (Latin, = sweet diabetes), in which the body is unable to metabolize sugar and starch properly; there are abnormally high levels of sugar in the blood, and the urine contains glucose. In 1922, as a result of the work of F. G. Banting, C. H. Best, and others, diabetes mellitus was found to be caused by a deficiency of the hormone insulin, which is produced in the pancreas. Diabetes mellitus can be controlled by a regulated diet and injections of insulin. If uncontrolled the result can be a build-up of ketones in the blood, leading to convulsions and coma. There is also a rare form of diabetes called diabetes insipidus (Latin, = insipid diabetes), which is caused by a deficiency of a pituitary hormone regulating kidney function, and does not involve sugar metabolism. Dickens /'dɪkɪnz/, Charles (John Huffam) (1812–70), English novelist. His early work consisted mainly of humorous sketches and short pieces for periodical publication; much of his fiction also first appeared in instalments in magazines. Dickens drew on his own childhood experiences of hardship and deprivation in his fiction, and many of his works are set in his native London. His novels are broad in scope and deal with all social classes, but they are particularly notable for their treatment of contemporary social problems, including the plight of the urban poor, corruption and inefficiency within the legal system, and general social injustices. Some of his most famous novels include Oliver Twist (1837–8), Nicholas Nickleby (1838–9), Bleak House (1852–3), and Great Expectations (1860–1). His satirical humour and varied characterizations, including such familiar caricatures as Scrooge (A Christmas Carol, 1843) and Mr Micawber (David Copperfield, 1850), contributed to the great popular appeal of his work.

- Dictionaries can be either bilingual or monolingual: early examples include Greek glossaries (1st–5th centuries AD) which explained the language used in literary works. In 16th-century England the demand was for bilingual dictionaries, especially Latin–English. In 1604 schoolmaster Robert Cawdrey produced A Table Alphabetical of English Words, regarded as the first monolingual English dictionary; during this period dictionaries contained only words regarded as difficult, but John Kersey broke with this tradition in 1702 by including the common words of the language and discarding some of the more fantastic formations. Nathan Bailey's dictionary (1721) of about 40,000 words, giving great attention to etymology, was extremely popular in the 18th century. Samuel Johnson's Dictionary (1755), based on a collection of citations from literature, replaced Bailey and remained the authoritative English dictionary for over a century (see JOHNSON⁶). The 19th century saw the publication of Noah Webster's American Dictionary of the English Language (1828), containing about 70,000 words, as well as the initiation of the largest and most comprehensive English language dictionary ever produced, the Oxford English Dictionary (see MURRAY², OXFORD ENGLISH DICTIONARY). Similarly ambitious projects were also carried out for other languages (see GRIMM, LITTRÉ). Many dictionaries are now also published in electronic form.

diesel /ˈdiːz(ə)l/ n. 1 (in full diesel engine) an internal-combustion engine in which the heat produced by the compression of air in the cylinder ignites the fuel. (See note below.) 2 a vehicle driven by a diesel engine. 3 fuel for a diesel engine. □ diesel-electric n. a vehicle driven by the electric current produced by a diesel-engined generator. ● adj. of or powered by this means. diesel oil a heavy petroleum fraction used as fuel in diesel engines. □ dieselize v.tr. (also -ise).

- The diesel engine was patented by the German engineer Dr Rudolf Diesel (1858–1913) in 1892. Air is compressed alone, inside the engine, causing its temperature to rise; fuel oil is sprayed into the combustion chamber when the air is hot enough to ignite the fuel, raising the temperature and pressure of the mixture to very high values at the start of the expansion process. A high compression ratio can be employed with no danger of the explosive combustion of a fuel/air mixture. The consequent high expansion ratio gives the diesel engine a higher thermal efficiency than petrol engines, over 40 per cent in large engines. Diesel engines have been mainly used to power ships, railway locomotives, commercial road vehicles, and electrical generators, although use in smaller vehicles such as private cars is increasing.

dinosaur /ˈdaɪnəˌsɔː(r)/ n. 1 an extinct reptile of the Mesozoic era, often reaching enormous size. (See note below.) 2 something that has not adapted to changing circumstances, a clumsy survival from earlier times. □ dinosaurian /ˌdaɪnəˈsɔːrɪən/ adj. & n. [mod.L dinosaurus f. Gk deinos terrible + sauros lizard]

▪ The dinosaurs belong to two major groups, the lizard-hipped dinosaurs (order Saurischia) and the bird-hipped dinosaurs (order Ornithischia). The first of these are further divided into the theropods, which were mostly bipedal flesh-eaters, and the sauropods, which were mostly huge plant-eaters. The bird-hipped dinosaurs were all herbivores, and include the iguanodon, duck-billed dinosaurs, and armoured dinosaurs such as the stegosaurus and triceratops. Dinosaurs were clearly more active animals than modern reptiles, which suggests that they may have been warm-blooded, and their closest living relatives are the birds. Along with many other Mesozoic animals, they were all extinct by the end of the Cretaceous period (65 million years ago), possibly as a result of the effects of a catastrophic asteroid impact in the Gulf of Mexico.

Diocletian /ˌdaɪəˈkliːʃ(ə)n/ (full name Gaius Aurelius Valerius Diocletianus) (245–313), Roman emperor 284–305. Faced with military problems on many frontiers and insurrection in the provinces, in 286 he divided the empire between himself in the east and Maximian (d.310) in the west. In 293 he further divided the empire, giving Galerius (d.311) control of Illyricum and the valley of the River Danube, with Constantius Chlorus (d.306) ruling Gaul, Spain, and Britain. An enthusiast for the old Roman religion, tradition, and discipline, Diocletian insisted on the maintenance of Roman law in the provinces and launched the final harsh persecution of the Christians (303). He abdicated in 305.

Diogenes /daɪˈɒdʒɪˌniːz/ (*c.*400–*c.*325 BC), Greek philosopher. He was the most famous of the Cynics and the pupil of Antisthenes (*c.*445–*c.*365 BC). He lived in Athens in extreme poverty and asceticism (according to legend, he lived in a tub) and was accordingly nicknamed Kuōn ('the dog'), from which the Cynics derived their name. He emphasized self-sufficiency and the need for natural, uninhibited behaviour, regardless of social conventions. Among the many stories told of him is that he took a lantern in daylight, saying that he was seeking an honest man.

Dionysius /ˌdaɪəˈnɪsɪəs/ the name of two rulers of Syracuse:

Dionysius I (known as Dionysius the Elder) (*c.*430–367 BC), ruled 405–367. After establishing himself as a tyrannical ruler in 405, he waged three wars against the Carthaginians for control of Sicily, the third of which (383–*c.*375) resulted in his defeat at Cronium. Nevertheless, his reign made him the principal power in Greek Italy, after the capture of Rhegium (386) and other Greek cities in southern Italy.

Dionysius II (known as Dionysius the Younger) (*c.*397–*c.*344 BC), son of Dionysius I, ruled 367–357 and 346–344. He lacked his father's military ambitions and signed a peace treaty with Carthage in 367. Despite his patronage of philosophers, he resisted the attempt by Plato to turn him into a philosopher-king, in 366 banishing the wealthy Syracusan Dion (*c.*408–*c.*354), the proponent of the scheme. He was subsequently overthrown by Dion in 357.

Dionysius Exiguus /ɪgˈzɪgjʊəs/ (died *c.*556), Scythian monk and scholar. He is famous for introducing the system of dates BC and AD that is still in use today, accepting 753 AUC as the year of the Incarnation; this has since been shown to be mistaken. He is said to have given himself the nickname Exiguus ('little'), as a sign of humility.

Dionysius of Halicarnassus (1st century BC), Greek historian, literary critic, and rhetorician. He lived in Rome from 30 BC. He is best known for his detailed history of Rome, written in Greek; this covers the period from the earliest times until the outbreak of the first Punic War (264 BC).

Dionysius the Areopagite /ˌærɪˈɒpəˌgaɪt/ (1st century AD), Greek churchman. His conversion by St Paul is recorded in Acts 17:34 and according to tradition he went on to become the first bishop of Athens. He was later confused with St Denis and with a mystical theologian, Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite (fl. 500), whose Neoplatonic Christian writings exercised a profound influence on medieval theology.

Dionysus /ˌdaɪəˈnaɪsəs/ Gk Mythol. a Greek god, son of Zeus and Semele, also called Bacchus; his worship entered Greece from Thrace *c.*1000 BC. Originally a god of the fertility of nature, associated with wild and ecstatic religious rites, in later traditions he is a god of wine who loosens inhibitions and inspires creativity in music and poetry.

Diophantine equation /ˌdaɪəˈfæntɪn, -taɪn/ n. Math. an equation with integral coefficients for which integral solutions are required. [DIOPHANTUS]

Diophantus /ˌdaɪəˈfæntəs/ (fl. prob. *c.*250 AD), Greek mathematician, of Alexandria. Diophantus was the first to attempt an algebraical notation. In his Arithmetica he showed how to solve simple and quadratic equations. His work led Pierre de Fermat to take up the theory of numbers, in which he made his famous discoveries.

dioptre /daɪˈɒptə(r)/ n. (US diopter) Optics a unit of refractive power of a lens, equal to the reciprocal of its focal length in metres. [F dioptre f. L dioptra f. Gk dioptra: see OIOPTRIC]

Dior /ˈdiːɔː(r)/, Christian (1905–57), French couturier. In 1947 he showed his first collection, featuring narrow-waisted tightly fitted bodices and full pleated skirts; this became known as the New Look and initially shocked the fashion world by its extravagance. He remained an influential figure in fashion, for example creating the first A-line garments, and built up a range of quality accessories. He discovered and trained Yves Saint Laurent.

diorama /ˌdaɪəˈrɑːmə/ n. 1 a scenic painting in which changes in colour and direction of illumination simulate a sunrise etc. 2 a small representation of a scene with three-dimensional figures, viewed through a window etc. 3 a small-scale model or film-set. □ dioramic /-ˈræmɪk/ adj. [DI-^{3} + Gk horama -atos f. horaō see]

Dioscuri /ˌdaɪɒˈskʊərɪ, daɪˈoskjʊrɪ/ Gk & Rom. Mythol. the twins Castor and Pollux (also called Polydeuces), born to Leda, wife of Tyndareus, after her seduction by Zeus. Castor was mortal, the son of Tyndareus; his twin, Pollux, was immortal, the son of Zeus; at Pollux's request they shared his immortality between them, spending half their time below the earth with Hades and the other half on Olympus. They are often identified with the constellation Gemini, and were the patrons of mariners. [Gk, = sons of Zeus]

dioxide /daɪˈoksaɪd/ n. Chem. an oxide containing two atoms of oxygen which are not linked together (carbon dioxide).

dioxin /daɪˈoksɪn/ n. Chem. a toxic compound produced in some manufacturing processes. Dioxins are a group of compounds whose molecules contain two benzene rings joined by a pair of oxygen atoms, but the term is applied especially to a compound known fully as 2,3,7,8-tetrachlorodibenzo-para-dioxin (chem. formula: $C_{12}H_4O_2Cl_4$). This compound (also called TCDD) is a contaminant of some commercial insecticides, notably 2,4,5-T. It resists degradation in the environment and is a persistent pollutant. It is extremely poisonous and is known to cause nervous disorders, skin diseases, cancer, and birth defects. Several incidents involving dioxin have led to evacuation of contaminated areas, e.g. at Seveso near Milan in 1976. [f. DI-^{1} + OX- + -IN]
